

Handling Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants

A National Bench Guide for Judges

Prepared by the Self Represented Litigation Network

2008

Based on the 2007 California Bench Guide

Developed by the Self-Represented Litigation Network, the National Judicial College, the National Center for State Courts, and the American Judicature Society. This document was developed under a grant from the State Justice Institute (SJI-07-N-057). Points of view and opinions stated in this document do not necessarily represent the official position or policies of the State Justice Institute. Nor do they represent those of the National Center for State Courts or any participant in, or funder of, the Self Represented Litigation Network.

The National Version of this Bench Guide has been funded in part by the State Justice Institute (SJI-07-N-057). Thanks to the California and Maryland Administrative Offices of the Courts for their support.

The publication of the original California version on which it was based was made possible by a grant from the State Justice Institute (SJI-05-N-002), with supplemental funding from the Foundation of the State Bar of California.

---

Points of view expressed herein do not necessarily represent the official positions or policies of the Judicial Council of California, the California or Maryland Administrative Office of the Courts, the State Justice Institute, or the Foundation of the State Bar of California, the Self-Represented Litigation Network, the National Center for State Courts, or the members of the Self-Represented Litigation Network.

---

The original California version is Copyright © 2008 by Judicial Council of California/Administrative Office of the Courts and the National Center for State Courts.

All Rights Reserved.

The original California version contains the notice that "Except as permitted under the Copyright Act of 1976 and as otherwise expressly provided herein, no part of this publication may be reproduced in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including the use of information storage and retrieval systems, without permission in writing from the copyright holder. Permission is hereby granted to nonprofit institutions to reproduce and distribute this publication for educational purposes if the copies credit the copyright holders."

---

This National Version is Copyright National Center for State Courts 2008. Copyright in this national product is in the name of the National Center for State Courts, but permission is hereby granted to state and local courts to modify and/or reproduce for their direct use, provided credit is given, proper copyright is indicated, and these requirements are noted. This permission does NOT extend to public posting on the Internet.

NATIONAL BENCHGUIDE
SELF-REPRESENTED LITIGATION NETWORK

PARTICIPATING ORGANIZATIONS

American Association of Law Librarians

American Judicature Society

California Administrative Office of the Courts

Conference of State Court Administrators

Conference of Chief Justices

Harvard Law School Bellow Sacks Project on the Future of Access to Justice

Law School Consortium Project

Legal Services Corporation

Maryland Administrative Office of the Courts

National Center for State Courts

National Association for Court Management

National Association of IOLTA Programs

National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges

JUDICIAL CONFERENCE EDUCATION ADVISORY GROUP

National Center for State Courts,
Kathy Mays Coleman, Of Counsel Program

The National Judicial College
Robin Wosje, Esq., Academic Director

American Judicature Society
Cynthia Gray, Esq., Director, Center on Judicial Ethics

Legal Services Corporation
Glenn Rawdon, Esq., Program Counsel

Alaska
Larry Cohn, Esq., Executive Director, Alaska Judicial Council

Arizona
Judge Rebecca Albrecht (retired)
Commissioner Karen S. Adam, Pima County Superior Court

California
Hon Donna J. Hitchens, Superior Court of California, County of San Francisco
Bonnie Rose Hough, Esq., California Administrative Office of the Courts
Hon. Mark Juhas, Superior Court of California, County of Los Angeles
Hon. Laurie D. Zelon, Associate Justice, California Court of Appeal

Indiana
Hon. Gregory J. Donat, Superior Court

Maryland
Pamela Cardullo Ortiz, Exec. Dir., Family Admin. Admin. Office of the Court

Massachusetts
Hon. Cynthia J. Cohen, Associate Justice, Massachusetts Appeals Court

Minnesota
Susan Ledray, Pro Se Services Manager, 4th Jud. District Court, Hennepin County
Hon. Kevin Burke, 4th Judicial District Court, Hennepin County

Montana
Chief Justice Karla M. Gray, Montana Supreme Court

New York
Hon. Fern A. Fisher, Administrative Judge of the Civil Court of the City of New York

Oregon
Honorable Maureen McKnight, Circuit Court Judge

Texas
Judge Marilea W. Lewis, 330th Judicial District Court

Wisconsin
Anne Zimmerman, Esq. State Pro Se Coordinator, State of Wisconsin
Supreme Court

CALIFORNIA BENCHGUIDE

Judicial Council of California
ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICE OF THE COURTS

CHIEF JUSTICE RONALD M. GEORGE
Chair, Judicial Council

WILLIAM C. VICKREY
Administrative Director of the Courts

RONALD G. OVERHOLT
Chief Deputy

CENTER FOR FAMILIES, CHILDREN & THE COURTS PROJECT STAFF:

DIANE NUNN
Director

CHARLENE E. DEPNER
Assistant Director

LEE MORHAR
Assistant Director

BONNIE ROSE HOUGH
Supervising Attorney

DEBORAH CHASE
Senior Attorney

HEATHER ANDERSON
Senior Attorney

ALAN WIENER
Attorney

JOSEPH NGUYEN
Administrative Coordinator

JOHN GREACEN

Consultant

KATHLEEN SIKORA
Consultant

KELLY TAIT
Consultant

RICHARD ZORZA
Consultant

Table of Contents

1. Self-Represented Litigants: Who Are They and What Do They Face When They Come to Court?
2. Expanding Access to the Court Without Compromising Neutrality
3. Law Applicable to a Judge's Ethical Duties in Dealing with Self-Represented Litigants
4. Solutions for Evidentiary Challenges
5. Caseflow Management
6. Courtroom and Hearing Management
7. Settling Cases
8. Special Due Process Considerations
9. Communication Tools
10. Avoiding Unintended Bias
11. Addressing Litigant Mental Health Issues in the Courtroom
12. Judicial Leadership in Access to Justice

Overview

One of the most significant changes in the court system of the nation in recent years is the growing number of self-represented litigants. Most judges now spend a significant portion of their judicial career handling cases in which at least one party is self-represented.

This change offers both opportunities and challenges for trial judges, highlighting the crucial role that they play in making sure that the self-represented obtain access to justice.

Many judges report that they like handling cases with self-represented litigants because these litigants do not generally engage in legal gamesmanship. These judges find it easier to get quickly to the crux of a matter and to craft creative problem-solving orders for litigants.

However, self-represented litigants often have difficulty preparing complete pleadings, meeting procedural requirements, and articulating their cases clearly to the judicial officer. These difficulties produce obvious challenges.

Many innovative solutions exist to help litigants draft adequate pleadings and prepare for hearings. Yet these solutions cannot completely substitute for the three years of law school and the experience that lawyers bring to the courtroom. Until recently, there has been little guidance for judges on how to meet the challenges of ensuring access to justice while running an efficient calendar that includes such cases.

This benchguide is designed to help judges handle the growing self-represented litigant portion of their caseload. Based on the experiences of hundreds of judges who have shared their perspectives, ideas, and suggestions, this guide includes tools and techniques to help judges run their courtrooms effectively, comply with the law, maintain neutrality, and increase access to justice.

The benchguide starts with a general discussion of the characteristics and needs of the self-represented and offers guidance on how to handle cases with self-represented litigants, including a review of the case law on this issue. It discusses caseload and calendar management and provides scripts and suggestions on managing a courtroom with self-represented litigants to ensure that it runs smoothly.

Because self-represented litigants do not have attorneys to interpret the “foreign” language of the courtroom, to explain the process, and to screen for and remedy problems that may occur, judges are faced with special challenges. This benchguide therefore provides specific information and tools on enhancing communication skills and on recognizing and dealing with potential unintended bias.

Historically, limited resources have been allocated to family, small claims, misdemeanor and traffic, and eviction cases, resulting in high-volume dockets that create heavy workloads for judges and that allow little time for litigants to present their cases. When judges feel that they have insufficient time to listen and get the facts they need to make a decision, their job becomes more stressful. The guide provides suggestions for ways to get help to make such assignments more manageable and concludes by discussing the crucial role of judicial leadership in building the innovations that enhance access to justice.

The guide is intended to provide a framework for analyzing the ethical, legal, and practical issues that judges face in handling a courtroom with self-represented litigants. It assumes that judges are most effective when they develop a style that works with their personality—but encourages them to reflect on that style and shares ideas that other jurists have found helpful. Many judges report that incorporating these techniques makes them more effective jurists in all cases, including those in which lawyers participate.

The benchguide is designed to help judges in all parts of their career—from the first day on the bench to veteran status—to think through these issues and find ways to make handling cases involving self-represented litigants a rewarding part of their judicial career.

This national benchguide has been adapted from a prior California version. While every effort has been made to describe national law and practice, the benchguide inevitably shows signs of its parentage – as indeed it should, given the national leadership role that California has long played in this area. Moreover, this is a rapidly evolving area of law and practice. This benchguide will therefore be updated and modified over time. Judges are encouraged to send suggestions, ideas, questions, and comments to richard@zorza.net. Readers are particularly urged to suggest changes that will more accurately reflect national patterns and meet national needs.

Chapter 1: Self-Represented Litigants: Who Are They and What Do They Face When They Come To Court?

Introduction	13-1
I. Why Do Litigants Represent Themselves?	1-23
II. Barriers to Self-Represented Litigants in the Court System	1-3
A. The Barrier of Legal Language	1-3
B. The Complexity of the Clerk's Office	1-4
C. Problems With Service	1-4
D. Legal Requirements That Are Not Intuitive	1-5
E. Procedural Rules That Vary Between Types of Cases	1-6
F. Overcrowded Dockets	1-6
G. Courts Often Do Not Prepare an Order After a Hearing	1-6
H. Cases Can Be Dismissed Because of Litigants' Failures to Perform Steps of Which They Had No Knowledge	1-7
I. Lack of Understanding of Orders and Judgments and How to Enforce Them	1-7
J. No Right to Interpreters in Civil Cases	1-8
Conclusion	1-8

1

Self-Represented Litigants: Who Are They and What Do They Face When They Come to Court?

Introduction

Many judges around the nation have expectations about who self-represented litigants are, why they do not have lawyers, what they want from the court, and how they will behave. These expectations play a powerful role in how the courts treat people who are representing themselves.

While many of these expectations come from experience, some may result from particularly dramatic or intense cases and may not reflect the complex reality of the millions who represent themselves in court each year.

Statistical surveys and court self-help centers have been critical for understanding this reality and for improving our response to the needs of such litigants.

This chapter provides background for judges on the issues set out in this benchguide.

I. Why Do Litigants Represent Themselves?

Most self-represented litigants in civil cases give the following answers when asked why they do not have a lawyer:<sup>1</sup>

1. "I can't afford a lawyer"; or
2. "My case is simple enough to handle on my own."

These reasons for not having a lawyer reflect economic and social trends and are not likely to change in the near future.

Legal services programs are unable to meet the need for representation. Legal needs studies from around the United States indicate that legal services programs are able to serve only 20 percent of the people needing help.

I am handling a case where the parties really need an attorney to help them out. They keep coming to court, and I keep telling them that they need a lawyer. I finally realized that the only way they'll be able to get a lawyer is if I come up with the $5,000 retainer.

—Family law judge

Court-based research and statistics also show that a small number of self-represented litigants could afford an attorney (possibly by making some significant sacrifice) but still choose not to use one. They are part of a larger do-it-yourself social movement to forgo various professional services, including real estate brokers, investment advisors, doctors, and lawyers.

---

<sup>1</sup> Little systematic data is available for litigants who represent themselves in criminal court. This is likely to vary depending on the availability of public defender services, and many of the suggestions in this guide may pertain to some of these cases, particularly misdemeanors. However, the issues of felony or even misdemeanor cases where litigants are generally choosing to represent themselves, rather than have a public defender, are beyond the scope of this benchguide. While these cases represent a significant concern for judicial officers, they are a relatively small proportion of the millions of self-represented litigants. For additional assistance with these difficult cases, judges and judicial officers are encouraged to review the "Pro Per Courtroom" chapter of Developing Effective Practices in Criminal Caseload Management (J. Greacen, 2004), a manual prepared for the California Administrative Office of the Courts.

It is important for judges to be aware that the “choice” not to have a lawyer is generally not a choice that litigants wish to make, but that litigants are trying to take care of problems in their lives in the best way that they can.

II. Barriers to Self-Represented Litigants in the Court System

Despite the many efforts at improving access to the courts for the self-represented, they still face many barriers, not all of which are obvious to those who work in the courts.

A. The Barrier of Legal Language

The specialized language of the courts, for example, can act as a barrier. To understand the impact of this barrier, it may be useful to reflect on experiences in hospitals. Hospital patients are often highly confused and intimidated by the many specialized terms that hospital staff use as shorthand. When used without explanation, these terms can be frightening to patients, who are at the mercy of the institution’s procedures. This is heightened by the fact that the underlying problem bringing them to the hospital is usually emotionally charged, and they are scared to be there in the first place.

Even when patients think that they understand what they are being told at the time, it’s easy to be confused later when they try to remember what their doctor said or what actions they were supposed to take.

The experience of self-represented litigants in our courthouses and courtrooms is often similar.

People representing themselves often find it extremely difficult to understand the words used in the courtroom, particularly when the judge and staff use Latin or French terms that lawyers rely on as legal shorthand. This is even more complicated for those who do not speak English as their first language and who come from different cultures.

An obvious example is “pro se,” a Latin phrase meaning “appearing for oneself,” which is still often widely used in the courts. In fact, it has been said that “many pro se’s do not even know that that is what they are.” To avoid the confusing abbreviation, many judges and staff find it better to use the phrase “self-represented litigant.”

B. The Complexity of the Clerk’s Office

Litigants often find themselves in court clerks’ offices that are confusing and crowded with lawyers and litigants wanting information and assistance with filling out forms, as well as performing the traditional filing tasks.

In many cases, clerks have in the past been explicitly trained to never answer any questions from the nonlawyer public. Such assistance has been perceived as violating the court’s neutrality or as the unauthorized practice of law. Litigants therefore frequently still find their paperwork being refused as inappropriate or incomplete, but are given no help to correct it, no explanation of the problem or how to fix it, or no referral to someone who could help.

Self-represented litigants are often confused about the status of their case, what their next step should be, what the court has ordered, or even how to deal with conflicting orders that they didn’t even know existed.

C. Problems With Service

As every judge and attorney knows, to obtain a court order, not only must the litigant file a motion, but he or she—not the court—is also responsible for seeing that the papers are properly served on the opposing party. This often complex set of requirements has been a major obstacle to self-represented litigants and a major source of delay for the courts for several reasons.

1. The litigants may not understand that the court will not effect, or be responsible for, service.
2. The litigants may not understand that they cannot serve the papers themselves on the opposing party.

3. The litigants may not be able to physically locate the other party that they are required to serve, or to navigate the complex procedural alternatives available.
4. The litigants may not know that they must have a written proof of service form, filled out by the person who effected the service, and that that the written proof must be presented to the court before most orders can be made.
5. Litigants may fill out the required proof of service form incorrectly.
6. Often the litigants are unaware of the alternative service methods available, what those often highly complex alternatives require, or how to access and make use of them. (How many judges or lawyers have tried to summarize the laws governing service in a few simple sentences? How many have succeeded?)
7. When litigants appear for their hearing without having successfully accomplished effective service or without a completed proof of service, the case will be postponed until a later date or dismissed. This causes distress and hardship to litigants, delays their ability to enforce important rights, and takes up valuable time for both the litigants and the court.

D. Legal Requirements That Are Not Intuitive

Most legal cases involve technical and sometimes superficially counterintuitive requirements that are confusing—even to lawyers with limited experience in a subject matter. For example, in family law, if there are financial issues of any kind involved, such as child or spousal support, the litigants are required to prepare detailed income and expense declarations prior to the court appearance. Frequently they are not aware of this requirement and fail to prepare the proper documents, which is likely to result in additional delays and frustration for all. In civil cases, defendants must serve an answer before they file it with the court. Some courts may require particular pleadings to be prepared on different colored forms or to comply with other local rules. These requirements are often tremendously frustrating for self-represented litigants.

E. Procedural Rules That Vary Between Types of Cases

Procedural rules in many courts and many types of cases require the parties to request a hearing in order for the case to move forward and the court does not routinely schedule such hearings on its own initiative. Many self-represented litigants are completely unaware of this requirement, which is inconsistent with the way that most nonjudicial institutions function. This can be particularly confusing if litigants have had prior experience in types of cases, such as juvenile dependency or domestic violence, in which the court may take a much more active role in setting hearings and managing the cases.

In one study on why self-represented litigants hadn't finished their divorce cases after five months, 60 percent of such litigants either did not realize that there was anything more that they had to do or just did not know what to do. Nearly 20 percent were waiting to hear from the court before doing anything more.<sup>2</sup>

F. Overcrowded Dockets

All too often, cases with self-represented litigants are handled on highly crowded dockets. Time constraints and evidentiary issues can prevent litigants from communicating sufficiently, clearly, and comprehensively with the judge. Litigants often do not understand what information the judge needs to make a decision on a given issue and therefore often take court time asking judges and courtroom staff to explain legal terms and procedures to them. Frustration for both litigant and judge occurs when a self-represented party insists, often in good faith, on giving lengthy explanations about matters that he or she does not realize are irrelevant as a matter of law to the issue at hand.

G. Courts Often Do Not Prepare an Order After a Hearing

Each time there is a hearing in a case where the judge makes an order, the order needs to be memorialized in writing. In many, but not all, states and types of court it is the attorney's responsibility to prepare the written order after hearing. Self-represented litigants often do not know that this is required, let alone how to prepare such orders in a manner acceptable to the court and to law enforcement. As a result, they leave without written orders to which they can refer, and the court's action is therefore effectively unenforceable. The lack of enforcement of the court's action undercuts the legitimacy of and confidence in the legal system.

---

<sup>2</sup> The study was conducted in San Diego California. J. Greacen, Developing Effective Practices in Family Law Caseflow Management (California Administrative Office of the Courts, Center for Families, Children & the Courts, 2005), p. 25.

Without a written order, it is extremely difficult for litigants to be fully aware of their rights and responsibilities arising from the court's decision. Additionally, lack of a written order leaves the court file with only an abbreviated minute order for the judge to refer to when reviewing the file for future hearings. This makes enforcement of these orders well-nigh impossible.

Because self-represented litigants do not realize that they are generally required to prepare a proposed judgment for the court's review and signature, there may be no order at all, or inaccurate or incomplete judgment paperwork will often be processed and returned repeatedly before final judgment is eventually, if ever, entered. Often, the lack of an order does not come to the court's attention until there is a crisis and the order must be enforced.

H. Cases Can Be Dismissed Because of Litigants' Failures to Perform Steps of Which They Had No Knowledge

When self-represented litigants fail to take the necessary steps to complete their cases, the courts deem them abandoned and will dismiss such cases after several years, on the grounds of "lack of prosecution." As many as one-third of all family law files from the 1980s prepared for archiving in one trial court lack a final judgment.<sup>3</sup> This can obviously have serious and irreversible consequences for the litigants and their children.

I. Lack of Understanding of Orders and Judgments and How to Enforce Them

Litigants often do not understand the terms of the court's orders and judgments. Without an attorney, they have no one to help them interpret those terms or their implications. Moreover, litigants often lack an understanding of the legal mechanisms for enforcing the terms of a court's judgment. Many expect the court to enforce its orders on its own. If the other party does not comply voluntarily, they are at a loss as to how to proceed.

---

<sup>3</sup> Ibid.

J. No Right to Interpreters in Civil Cases

Many states fail to provide interpreters in most types of civil cases. Thus limited-English-speaking self-represented litigants end up with neither an attorney nor an interpreter to help them navigate or understand the court system or understand and participate in hearings and trials. Family members and friends who may be enlisted to assist might or might not have adequate language skills, especially when it comes to legal terminology, or may have conflicts of interest that make their translation suspect. Judges find it extremely frustrating to hear a non-English-speaking litigant talk for one minute and have it translated as "no"; they find it troubling that they may be making rulings without having all the relevant information. Similarly, litigants who do not know what they or the other parties were ordered to do, or why they were ordered to do it, are likely to fail to comply with the order. They could then be violating a court order without intending to do so, with serious consequences.

Conclusion

Generally, self-represented litigants do not choose to be without lawyers; they want to play by the rules, but they still face a wide and complicated variety of barriers to access.

This information should guide the approach of the courts, judges, and court staff as they seek to make sure that the system as a whole is accessible to all. The remaining chapters of this benchguide seek to serve that goal.

Chapter 2: Expanding Access to the Court Without Compromising Neutrality

Introduction	2-1
I. Substantive Justice	2-2
II. Procedural Justice	2-3
A. "Voice"—the Opportunity to Be Heard	2-3
B. Neutrality	2-4
C. Trustworthiness	2-5
D. Interpersonal Respect	2-6
E. Demeanor of the Proceedings	2-7
Conclusion	2-7

2

Expanding Access to the Court Without Compromising Neutrality

Introduction

Some judges instinctively feel that involving themselves actively in a hearing or trial—as is often necessary if the judge is to obtain needed information from self-represented litigants—may cause one or more of the parties to the proceeding to perceive that the judge failed to maintain judicial neutrality. On the contrary, such active involvement is not only fully consistent with access to justice, and often required by it, but can enhance the court’s neutrality.<sup>4</sup>

As the newly adopted Comment to the ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct puts it:

It is not a violation of this Rule [2.2] for a judge to make reasonable accommodations to ensure pro se litigants the opportunity to have their matters fairly heard.

The California Court of Appeal, for example, has explicitly recognized the necessity for, and has approved, such judicial behavior:

We know the litigants, both plaintiffs and defendants, are unrepresented by counsel in the vast majority of cases—as was true here. We also know this fact influences how these hearings should be conducted—with the judge necessarily expected to play a far more active role in developing the facts, before then making the decision whether or not to issue the requested permanent protective order. In such a hearing, the judge cannot rely on the pro per litigants to know each of the procedural steps, to raise objections, to ask all the

---

<sup>4</sup> The concepts in this chapter derive in significant part from those developed in R. Zorza, The Disconnect Between the Requirements of Judicial Neutrality and Those of the Appearance of Neutrality, When Parties Appear Pro Se, 23 GEORGETOWN GEO. JOURNAL OF LEGAL ETHICS 423 (2004). Available through Selfhelpsupport.org at: <http://www.selfhelpsupport.org/link.cfm?8733>

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Font: 10 pt

relevant questions of witnesses, and to otherwise protect their due process rights.

Ross v. Figueroa (2006) 139 Cal.App.4th 856; 43 Cal. Rptr. 3d 289.

This practical attitude is shared by many other courts, see, for example, “[It is] our established policy to allow great latitude to a litigant who either by choice or necessity, represents himself in legal proceedings, so long as such latitude is consistent with the rights of any adverse party.” Cersosino v. Cersosino, 449 A.2d 1026 (Ct; 1986).

This evolving understanding also reflects the findings in the report by the National Center for State Courts, Trust and Confidence in the California Courts 2005, which found that while attorneys were most often concerned with fairness in terms of the substantive legal outcomes of cases, Citizens’ views of the courts, are heavily influenced by their perceptions of the courts’ ability to deliver a fair process.<sup>5</sup>

I. Substantive Justice

While the public focuses heavily on procedural justice matters, it is imperative that concern for substantive justice be given equal attention in cases involving self-represented litigants.

To decide cases fairly, judges need facts, and in self-represented litigant cases, to get facts, judges often have to ask questions, modify procedure, and apply their common sense in the courtroom to create an environment in which all the relevant facts are brought out.

In short, judges have found as a practical matter that a formalized, noncommunicative role in dealing with cases involving self-represented litigants can lead to serious decision-making problems. Without the additional facts that active judicial involvement brings to light, judges are at risk of making wrong decisions.

---

<sup>5</sup> Attorneys, interestingly, are more concerned with the fairness of the outcomes of the cases than with the fairness of the process by which the outcomes are attained.

II. Procedural Justice

Over the last 30 years, research has repeatedly established that when litigants perceive that a decision-making process is fair, they are more likely to be satisfied with the outcome.<sup>6</sup>

Perceptions of the importance of fairness do not appear to be related to any particular cultural background or other personal characteristic of the litigant, but are universal.<sup>7</sup>

The elements of “procedural justice” that have been established in the research literature closely mirror broad concepts deeply familiar to and heavily ingrained in lawyers and judges from their legal training in procedure and due process.

A. “Voice”—the Opportunity to Be Heard

For litigants to feel that a process is fair, they must feel that they have had a “voice” in the process. They need an opportunity to be heard by the decision-maker. For litigants to believe that they have had an opportunity to participate in the decision-making process, two things must occur:<sup>8</sup>

1. There must be an opportunity for input into the decision-making process; and,
2. This input must have some effect on the decision-maker. If litigants perceive that their contribution is not heard or considered, then the “voice” is lost.

When self-represented litigants are stumbling in their stories, confused by the foundational requirements of some forms of evidence and unable to get relevant facts before the court, they do not have a genuine voice in their cases. Judges have long been asking questions of the litigants themselves, following up when those questions are answered inadequately, summarizing the law when that is helpful to move the case forward, and answering the parties’ questions about the proceedings when such answers are helpful in promoting understanding and compliance.

<sup>6</sup> C. Thibaut and L. Walker, Procedural Justice: A Psychological Analysis (Hillsdale, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum, 1975).

<sup>7</sup> T. Tyler, What Is Procedural Justice? Criteria Used by Citizens to Assess the Fairness of Legal Procedures (1988) 22 LAW & SOC’Y REV. 103.

<sup>8</sup> Cal. Benchguide 54, supra; Connor, Pro Per Problems and Difficult Defendants, supra; Pro Per Courtroom, supra.

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: No underline

Formatted: Font: Italic

B. Neutrality

Litigants expect judges to be honest and impartial decision-makers who base decisions on facts and law. This includes the ability to suppress any bias the judge may have and to avoid showing favoritism.<sup>9</sup> It also involves consistency such that there should be similar treatment across people and time.<sup>10</sup>

Judges always need to be diligent about neutrality issues when interacting with self-represented litigants, just as they are with attorneys; however, the goal is to avoid prejudice and bias—not to avoid communication. Communication between judges and the participants in hearings, particularly hearings without juries, is critical. The ability to conduct impartial and neutral communications comfortably with all courtroom participants is a huge benefit for any judge hearing large numbers of cases involving self-represented litigants.

Conversely, when a judge feels the need to restrict such communication, he or she may risk seriously impeding one or the other side of a self-represented litigant case from adequately presenting its position, thereby creating the appearance of bias and limiting the facts on which the court can base its decision. For example, a judge may hesitate to inform a party that for a document to be considered, a proper foundation must be laid, for fear that giving the litigant this information will be seen as taking sides. Or the judge may hold back from pursuing a line of questioning, even if the answers would provide information needed to decide the case fairly, to prevent the appearance of trying to help the litigant provide the “right” answer. In either case, lack of communication from the judge has potentially hampered one side of the case and inhibited the court’s ability to base its decision on the law and the facts.

As shown in detail in the discussion in chapter 3, the American Bar Association’s Model Code of Judicial Conduct encourage proper unbiased judicial communication that promotes high-quality decision making. There is nothing in the Model Code, in the reports of disciplinary proceedings, or in <sup>10</sup> G. S. Leventhal, “What Should Be Done with Equity Theory?” in Social Exchange: Advances in Theory and Research (K. J. Gergen, M. S. Greenberg, and R. H. Weiss, eds.), New York: Plenum, 1980).

<sup>9</sup> T. Tyler, “The Psychology of Procedural Justice: A Test of the Group-Value Model,” (1990) 57(5) Journal of Personality and Social Psychology 830–838 (1990).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

the case law that prohibits such nonprejudicial judicial communication or engagement. Rather, what is prohibited is nonneutrality or bias.<sup>11</sup>

Indeed, we know of no reported cases in which a decision has been reversed or a judge disciplined merely for such nonprejudicial engagement in fact-finding. To the extent that decisions are reversed, or judges disciplined, it is for aggressively biased activity in a case.<sup>12</sup>

C. Trustworthiness

Litigants expect judges to be basically benevolent toward them, to be motivated to treat them fairly, to be sincerely concerned with their needs, and to be willing to consider their side of the story.<sup>13</sup>

Litigants pay close attention to their perceptions of each individual judge's motivation toward them and toward others in the courtroom. If participants believe that the judge was trying to be fair, they tend to view the entire procedure as a fair one. Similarly, if the judge treats people politely, and exhibits a clear concern for their rights, litigants are likely to view the entire process as fair.<sup>14</sup>

When the judge asks questions, explains requirements or the law, and takes steps to move the case along—and does so in an evenhanded manner applied to both sides—the judge's motivations are far easier for the litigants to read than if the judge is noncommunicative. Lack of communication provides little on which an observer can base a judgment of neutrality or other trustworthiness, except the ultimate decision, which may well be subject to a very broad range of interpretation. Litigants may focus on a casual gesture, fleeting facial expression, or perceived inattention to a

<sup>11</sup> The 2007 version of the ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct requires, at Canon 1, that a judge "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety" and, at Canon 2, that he or she shall "perform the duties of judicial office impartially competently and diligently."

<sup>12</sup> U.S. cases and decisions are collected and analyzed in Albrecht et al., Judicial Techniques for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants, (Winter 2003) 41 JUDGES' JOURNAL 16, available online at <http://www.zorza.net/JudicialTech.JJWi03.pdf>; and Gray, Reaching Out or Overreaching: Judicial Ethics and Self-Represented Litigants (American Judicature Society; 2006); available at <http://www.ajs.org/prose/pdfs/Pro%20se%20litigants%20final.pdf> and R. Zorza, The Disconnect Between the Requirements of Judicial Neutrality and Those of the Appearance of Neutrality When Parties Appear Pro Se: Causes, Solutions, Recommendations, and Implications (2004) 23 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 423, esp. notes 17 and 18 at page 430, and text and notes at pages 448–452. California cases are discussed in chapter 3, below. This article is available through Selfhelpsupport.org at <http://www.selfhelpsupport.org/link.cfm?8733>

<sup>13</sup> Tyler, "Psychology of Procedural Justice."

<sup>14</sup> Tyler, What Is Procedural Justice?

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Font: 10 pt

Formatted: Font: Italic

presentation (e.g., when the judge is reading documents in the file) and may completely misinterpret a judge's motivation toward them.

D. Interpersonal Respect

When litigants are treated as valued members of society, they are more likely to feel satisfied that the process is fair. Litigants must be treated with dignity and respect by judges and courtroom staff.<sup>15</sup>

Interchanges between judges and litigants in a courtroom setting are clearly not conducted in a manner socially familiar to most self-represented parties. If conducted in too formal a manner, the communication style can be legally arcane and seem almost hostile; if conducted in too informal a manner, there may be a risk of appearing undignified or disrespectful to litigants because they are without counsel, or even seeming too relaxed about attention to their legal rights.

When litigants feel insecure about their own status in a situation, they place increased attention on how they are treated by decision-makers;<sup>16</sup> therefore, self-represented litigants can be expected to pay close attention to the judge in an attempt to see how that judge is regarding them. If a judge is highly resistant to any type of interchange with litigants, there will be little data for them to use to assess the judge's attitude toward them, which may lead litigants to seize inappropriate cues on which to base their conclusion. For example, a judge exercising this type of detachment may be misinterpreted as disliking the litigant or being cold, uncaring, or disrespectful.

Generally speaking, being informed, prepared, and willing to get to the issues in a businesslike and friendly manner demonstrates respect for the litigants. Taking the time to listen to the positions of both sides and to communicate clearly the basis of the ultimate decision can result in a feeling of calm reassurance and stability that is almost palpable in the courtroom. In such circumstances it is not uncommon for even the losing party to leave the courthouse with a sense of satisfaction at being treated with dignity and respect.

E. Demeanor of the Proceedings

---

<sup>15</sup> Tyler, "Psychology of Procedural Justice."

<sup>16</sup> Tyler, What Is Procedural Justice?

Formatted: Font: Italic

Litigants value proceedings that are dignified, careful, understandable and comfortable for them. They have even ranked these factors above “voice” in importance. Therefore, the calm, well-organized management of the proceedings and of the courtroom is extremely important.<sup>17</sup>

There are a variety of steps a judge might take to create a procedurally fair and easily understood courtroom environment. Judges may want to implement structured court procedures so that each side has the greatest possible opportunity to be heard. This is done by being consistent in giving litigants the opportunity to explain why they are in court and what they want.

Judges can make it clear to the litigants that they have read and considered their submitted documents. Judges then have the option of asking for clarification, explanation, or more specific detail as needed. This process does not mean relinquishing control of the courtroom. To the contrary, it will allow judges to more easily limit the information to that which is relevant to their decision.

Judges can make opening statements explaining the process used in the courtroom. During the hearing, judges can break the case up into steps and explain what information is needed in each phase. Likewise, evidentiary rulings present an opportunity for the judge to explain the basis for a ruling in favor of or against admissibility in plain English.

A judge’s decision that follows these precepts will be much more comprehensible, even if the outcome is not what the litigant desired. Probably most importantly, the parties and observers will walk away with a greater understanding of the process as a whole and with a realistic perception of fairness as to the particular decision made by the court.

Conclusion

All litigants deserve to have decisions made on the basis of the facts and the law. The ability of a judge to conduct friendly, businesslike, and unbiased communication with self-represented litigants to obtain the best information on which to base high-quality decision making, and to convey the proper attitude of the court toward them, is an enormous benefit.

---

<sup>17</sup> E. A. Lind, R. J. Maccoun, P. A. Ebener, W. C. F. Felstiner, D. R. Hensler, J. Resnick, and T. R. Tyler, In the Eye of the Beholder: Tort Litigants’ Evaluations of Their Experiences in the Civil Justice System, (1990)-24 ~~LAW & SOCIETY-SOC.~~ REV. 953-995 (1990).

Formatted: Small caps

Chapter 3: Law Applicable to a Judge’s Ethical Duties in Dealing With Self-Represented Litigants

Introduction	3-13
I. Overview—the Ethical Rules Support Access and Neutrality	3-13
II. A Summary of the General State of the Law	3-3
III. What Judges Can Do, Must Do, and Can Not Do	3-4
Conclusion	3-11
Addendum	3-12

3

Law Applicable to a Judge's Ethical Duties in Dealing With Self-Represented Litigants

Introduction

While most states have adopted some amended version of the ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct,<sup>18</sup> the vast majority of the law governing the judge's ethical duties in self-represented litigation cases is ultimately state-based and the generalizations offered in this chapter are subject to state exception and should be the subject of state research.<sup>19</sup>

However, as a general matter, the law in most states — case law, ethical opinions, and judicial discipline decisions — generally supports the broad concepts outlined in the above chapter 2. Above all, the more detailed review of the law in this chapter underlines the breadth of discretion granted a trial judge in these matters.

I. Overview—the Ethical Rules Support Access and Neutrality

Judges dealing with self-represented litigants in the courtroom are subject to two ethical duties that complement each other to make clear that the primary value is access to justice.

Rule 2.6 of the ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct requires a judge to “accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding . . . the right to be heard according to law.” This rule provides support for <sup>18</sup> The ABA Model Code of Judicial Conduct was most recently amended in February of 2007. The new version is available online at http://www.abanet.org/judicialethics/approved\_MCJC.html. Of course, as of this writing, the process of adoption of this version in the states has only just begun.

---

<sup>19</sup> These citations in this chapter are generally to the law of the states. As a general matter, federal cases are not included. While many federal cases are of relevance, they tend to occur as a result of prisoner habeas corpus litigation, and as such reflect the particular policies applying to that situation.

decisions made by the judge that are intended to protect that interest in being heard.

Rule 2.2 requires the judge to “ . . . perform all duties of judicial office fairly and impartially.”

Some judges have come to worry that the actions they see as required to ensure a self-represented litigant’s “right to be heard” might be viewed as violating the court’s duty of impartiality, and they have come to feel that the duty of impartiality must trump the duty to ensure a litigant’s right to be heard.

However, the new 2007 Comment to ABA Model Code Rule 2.2 resolves any such uncertainty as follows:

It is not a violation of this Rule [2.2] for a judge to make reasonable accommodations to ensure pro se litigants the opportunity to have their matters fairly heard.

In other words, provided an accommodation is “reasonable,” and provided it is intended to provide self-represented litigants with the opportunity to “have their matters fairly heard”, then that accommodation is fully consistent with the requirements of neutrality and impartiality.<sup>20</sup>

Similarly, the American Bar Association Standards Relating to Trial Courts, Standard 2.23, has since 1976 found no inherent conflict between the two duties; rather, both may be met at the same time:

Conduct of Cases Where Litigants Appear Without Counsel. When litigants undertake to represent themselves, the court should take whatever measures may be reasonable and necessary to insure a fair trial.

Commentary

---

<sup>20</sup> At this early stage in the process of adoption the 2007 changes, this language is not yet in force in most states. It must therefore be emphasized that those who urged this and similar language regarded the new comment as not changing, but rather clarifying the law.

Those concerned with the process of adoption at the state level may find of use alternative more comprehensive language drafted by Chief Justice Karla Gray of the Montana Supreme Court and distributed by her to her fellow Chief Justices. This proposed language is appended to this chapter.

. . . . All such situations present great difficulties for the court because the court's essential role as an impartial arbiter cannot be performed with the usual confidence that the merits of the case will be fully disclosed through the litigant's presentations. These difficulties are compounded when, as can often be the case, the litigant's capacity even as a lay participant appears limited by gross ignorance, inarticulateness, naïveté, or mental disorder. They are especially great when one party is represented by counsel and the other is not, for intervention by the court introduces not only ambiguity and potential conflict in the court's role but also consequent ambiguity in the role of counsel for the party who is represented. Yet it is ultimately the judge's responsibility to see that the merits of a controversy are resolved fairly and justly. Fulfilling that responsibility may require that the court, while remaining neutral in consideration of the merits, assume more than a merely passive role in assuring that the merits are adequately presented.

The proper scope of the court's responsibility is necessarily an expression of careful exercise of judicial discretion and cannot be fully described by specific formula. . . . Where litigants represent themselves, the court in the interest of fair determination of the merits should ask such questions and suggest the production of such evidence as may be necessary to supplement or clarify the litigants' presentation of the case. (Italics added.)

II. A Summary of the General State of the Law

Decisions and disciplinary actions can be very generally, and subject to state exception, be summarized as follows:

1. The trial judge has broad discretion to adjust courtroom procedures to make sure a self-represented litigant can be heard.
2. Adjustments made by a judge that do not prejudice the rights of the opposing party to have the case decided on the facts and law will always be affirmed.
3. The judge will usually be affirmed if he or she refuses to make a specific adjustment, unless such refusal is manifestly unreasonable and unfair.

Future development of the law will likely focus on the boundaries of the judge’s discretion—those circumstances in which a judge must make adjustments in order to permit a self-represented litigant to be heard and those circumstances in which a judge is viewed as acting with prejudice to the rights of the other party to have its case decided on the facts and the law.

The current boundaries can be discerned in more detail from the review of caselaw below.<sup>21</sup>

III. What Judges Can Do, Must Do, and Can Not Do

A. What Judges Can Do

As a general matter, the most accurate general statement of the law throughout the states that we have been able to develop is that:

Judges may, in any area of courtroom management in which they have general discretion, take into account the self-represented status of a litigant, and the capacity of that litigant in deciding how to exercise their discretion.

This does not generally mean that they are necessarily obligated to take that status into account; it does not generally mean that they must take it into account in any particular way, and it certainly does not necessarily mean that litigants will be successful on appeal in claiming that their rights were denied by a judge’s failure to take it into account. But it does mean that a judge has great flexibility to consider self-representation status in the moment-to-moment management of the trial and the courtroom. This includes matters of evidence, general trial procedure, and courtroom management.

<sup>21</sup> This analysis draws heavily upon two major sources, Albrecht, Greacen, Hough and Zorza, Judicial Techniques for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants, 42 JUDGES’ JOURNAL, 16 (Spring 2003) and Gray, Reaching Out or Overreaching: Judicial Ethics and Self-Represented Litigants (American Judicature Society; 2006); available at <http://www.ajs.org/prose/pdfs/Pro%20se%20litigants%20final.pdf> See also, Zorza, The Disconnect Between the Requirements of Judicial Neutrality and Those of the Appearance of Neutrality when Parties Appear Pro Se: Causes, Solutions, Recommendations, and Implications, 17 GEORGETOWN GEO. JOURNAL OF LEGAL ETHICS, 423 (2004). Particular attention is drawn to Appendix One of this Benchguide: Proposed Best Practices for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants, reprinted from Reaching Out or Overreaching.

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

It does not generally include matters that are not the subject of discretion, such as the statute of limitations or jurisdictional requirements. An exception, allowing for, or even requiring, judicial flexibility might occur in special circumstances,<sup>22</sup> such as when the litigants failure to meet the requirements is the product of error or failure by the court.<sup>23</sup>

This general statement of the law is fully consistent with the many cases that refer, in one form or another, to the principle that self represented litigants are held to the same law, and governed by the same procedure as those with counsel, and with those cases that state that the self-represented are to obtain no advantage from their status. The self-represented, just like those with counsel, are to receive the benefit of a proceeding in which the substantive law and procedural rules are being applied; those procedural rules grant to the judge the discretion necessary for the procedure to be efficient and fair. In exercising that discretion, the judge may take all factors, including the general circumstances, the facts of the case, the nature of the parties, and the representation status of the litigants into account.

Another general way of saying it is that if the judge could exercise discretion in a particular way in a case with counsel, then he or she can almost certainly also do it when counsel are not there, even if he or she might choose not to do so in the same situation with counsel.

Also to be taken into account by judges is the fundamental principle that it is better to decide cases on the merits than on technicalities and that therefore it is appropriate to exercise discretion in a way that makes that possible.

The only general rule constraining that discretion is the critical one that the judge must remain neutral. His or her rulings must be focused on making sure that the decision is in accord with the facts and the law, not in order to obtain a particular result, or to reward or

---

<sup>22</sup> For such cases refusing to make accommodation, see, e.g., Bowman v. Pat's Auto Parts, 504 So.2d 736 (Ala. Civ. App.1987) (Self represented litigant held to Alabama rules of procedure which required that an appeal be filed within fourteen days of the clerk's entry of judgment in the docket, whether or not a party receives actual notice of the entry of the judgment.); International Fidelity and Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 443 N.-E.-2d 1308,1312 (Mass. 1983); In re Brewster, 351 A.2d 889, 890 (N.H. 1975).

<sup>23</sup> Rappleyea v. Campbell, 884 P.2d 126 (Cal. 1994) (Late filing of motion to vacate was consequence of mis-information from clerk as to fee.)

Formatted: Font: Italic

penalize a litigant for any reason, including their representation status. His or her engagement must not turn the judge into an advocate for the litigant.

Applying this principle, and within these limits, the judge can indeed generally do all of the following.

Explain the law, the process, the decision and the other events in the case and what they require.

This might as a practical matter include:

- Explaining the need to present evidence<sup>24</sup>,
- Helping the litigant focus on the issues at trial,<sup>25</sup>
- Explaining rulings,<sup>26</sup>
- Clarifying the procedure, and what procedure to follow<sup>27</sup>

---

<sup>24</sup> In Re Marriage of Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, 629 N.W.-2d 115, 119-120 (Minn. App. 2001) (Court explained and party understood the necessity of presenting evidence at trial.)

<sup>25</sup> Sopko v. Dowell Schumberger, Inc. 21 P.-3d 1265, 1273 (Alaska-Alaska 2001) (“The superior court did more than just advise Sopko of procedure; the court attempted to focus Sopko’s attention on the relevant issues at the hearing [relevance of discovery rule, application of discovery rule, and distinction from merits of tort claim].”; Griffith v. Griffith, 509 N.E.2d 38, 40 (Mass. App. 1987) (“Judge was warranted in attempting to narrow the issues, putting questions, and directing the course of the trial.”)

<sup>26</sup> Oko v. Rogers, 466 N.E.2d 658, 660 (Ill. App. ~~3d Dist.~~ 1984) (“Although the judge would carefully explain to the defendant why certain objections were being sustained, there is no evidence that he conducted the defendant’s case for him or failed to remain impartial.”) Castro v. Heinzman, 92 P.3d 758, 763 (Or. App. 2004) (“The court gave both parties a reasonable opportunity to present relevant evidence, and its comments in explanation of its view of the evidence, although unpalatable to respondent, were meant to convince him to leave petitioner alone. Giving that advice was not error.”)

<sup>27</sup> Breck v. Ulmer, 745 P.2d 66, 75 (Alaska 1987), cert denied, 485 U.S. 1023 (1988) (“[T]he trial judge should inform a pro se litigant of the proper procedure he or she is obviously attempting to accomplish.”; harmless error); Keating v. Traynor, 833 P. 2d. 695, 696 (Alaska 1992 (Trial court should have informed mother of correct procedure to intervene in child support procedure); Oko v. Rogers, supra, 466 N.E.2d at 661 (Illinois Appeals Court explains that “In order that the trial proceed with fairness, however, the judge finds [in self-represented case] that he must explain matters that would normally not require explanation and must point out rules and procedures that would normally not require pointing out.”); Austin v. Ellis, 408 A.2d 784, 785 (N.H. 1979) (“The court relaxed the rules of evidence and made a

- Explaining how to call witnesses,<sup>28</sup>
- Explaining how to challenge jurors,<sup>29</sup>
- The legal elements required to obtain relief,<sup>30</sup>
- How to introduce evidence,<sup>31</sup>
- How to object to evidence,<sup>32</sup>
- The right to cross examine,<sup>33</sup>
- The reasons for the sustaining of objections,<sup>34</sup> etc.

Modify the order of proceedings, including the taking of evidence

This is part of the inherent authority of the court to manage the case.

Call witnesses

This is generally considered within the inherent power of a judge.<sup>35</sup>

Ask questions of the self-represented party through their testimony to obtain information and avoid irrelevance

This is fully consistent with the general rule, and demonstrably neutral, provided justified by the record.<sup>36</sup>

---

special effort to explain to the plaintiff proper courtroom procedures in order to facilitate the plaintiff's presentation of the case.")

<sup>28</sup> Taylor v. Bell, 98 Cal. Rptr. 855 (1971).

<sup>29</sup> Monastero v. Los Angeles Transit Company, 280 P.2d 187 (Cal. App. 1955).

<sup>30</sup> Pete v. Henderson, 269 P.2d 78, 80 (Cal. 1st Dist. Div. 1, App. 1954) ("[O]ne of the chief objects served by a motion for nonsuit is to point out the oversights and defects in plaintiff's proofs, so he can supply if possible the specified deficiencies.")

This portion of the opinion was not overruled by Rappleyea v. Campbell, 884 P.2d 126 (1994).

<sup>31</sup> Lombardi v. Citizens Nat. Trust & Sav. Bank, 289 P.2d 823 (Cal. App. 1955).

<sup>32</sup> Nelson v. Gaunt, 178 Cal. Rptr. 167 (1981).

<sup>33</sup> Monastero v. Los Angeles Transit Company 280 P.2d 187 (Cal. App. 1955).

<sup>34</sup> Oko v. Rogers, supra, 466 N.E.2d at 660 (Illinois Appeals court supports trial judges explanation of reasons for sustaining opposing counsel's objections.)

<sup>35</sup> See, Taylor v. Bell, supra, Cal. Rptr at 855 (California Court of Appeal noting practice with apparent approval).

<sup>36</sup> State v. Hutch, 861 P.-2d 11, 15 (Haw. 1993) (criminal case); Oko v. Rogers, supra, 466 N.E.2d at 658 (Affirmed on appeal); "The court also guided the defendant through parts of his own testimony in order to avoid a long narrative on irrelevant

Ask questions of witnesses to obtain information needed for the decision

This is fully consistent with the law of most states, and fully neutral, provided the criteria the judge uses is necessity to get out the facts, rather than desire to favor one party.<sup>37</sup>

Instruct the jury sua sponte during a jury trial

This might include ignoring inadmissible testimony.<sup>38</sup>

Encourage the parties to consider settlement

Such encouragement and assistance is part of the routine management of the case.<sup>39</sup>

Explaining a Ruling

This is the case even if the explanation assists the litigant in preparing an amended pleading.<sup>40</sup>

B. What Judges Must Do:

As a general matter, there is much more variety among the states as to what judges MUST do. Various states have by caselaw established matters.”); Lapeyrouse v. Barbaree, 836 So.-2d 417, 421-422 (La. App. ~~1st cir.~~ 2002) (litigant questioned; court “does have authority, in a non-jury case, to reasonably question a witness for clarification when the facts are confused, undeveloped, or misleading.”) Castro v. Heinzman, supra, 92 P.3d at 763 (Oregon Appeals Court held that trial court not impermissibly biased in stalking protective order case where both parties appeared pro se and the trial court properly asked each of them questions in aid of its effort to resolve the merits of their dispute).

---

<sup>37</sup> Lapeyrouse v. Barbaree, 836 So.-2d 417, 421-422 (La. App. ~~1st cir.~~ 2002). (examination of expert); Oko v. Rogers, 466 N.E.2d 658 (Ill. App. ~~3d Dist.~~ 1984) (~~affir~~~~ed~~~~affirmed~~ on appeal); “Whenever necessary, the trial judge would make his own brief and limited examination of a witness in order to clarify the testimony.” ~~†~~; Griffith v. Griffith, 509 N.E.2d 38, 40 (Mass. App. 1987) (“the judge was warranted in attempting to narrow the issues, putting questions, and directing the course of the trial.”); State v. Mellen, 583 P.2d 46, 48 (Utah 1978) (criminal case).

<sup>38</sup> Nelson v. Gaunt, supra, 178 Cal. Rptr. at 167.

<sup>39</sup> E.g., ~~†~~ Monastero v. Los Angeles Transit Company, 280 P.2d 187 (Cal. App. 1955).

<sup>40</sup> Paulsen v. Evander, 633 So.-2d 540, 541 (Fl. ~~5th Dist. Ct of App.~~ 1994).

Formatted: Font: Italic

an expectation that judges must take certain actions to make sure that a case is heard.

Liberally construe documents filed, and liberally allow amendment

The rule requiring liberal construction of pleadings and documents,<sup>41</sup> and liberal amendment of pleadings<sup>42</sup> is recognized in almost all jurisdictions. It derives from the notice pleadings rules that apply when counsel are involved.<sup>43</sup> It would obviously be gross discrimination to apply these rules with a different spirit in the very situations in which they are most urgently needed.<sup>44</sup>

State-specific requirements that might be found to apply in other states

There is a growing body of cases that impose on trial judges specific obligations to respond when self represented litigants act or fail to act in particular ways. While it is too early to describe these cases as necessarily having reach beyond the particular state's borders they are useful for their logic and rationale, and might well be followed on appeal in other states.

By way of example, Alaska imposes on trial judges the "explicit" duty "to advise a pro se litigant of his or her right under the summary judgment rule to file opposing affidavits to defeat a motion for summary judgment,"<sup>45</sup> and, similarly to inform a litigant who sends a letter seeking to intervene of the correct procedure.<sup>46</sup> The duty does not extend to informing a litigant of the consequences of failure to

---

<sup>41</sup> Nelson v. Gaunt, supra, 178 Cal. Rptr. at 167, (California Appeals Court discusses misuse of term in notice of appeal.); Baske v. Burke, 177 Cal. Rptr. 794 (Cal. App. 1981) (Letter to judge included sufficient information to be deemed an answer-).

<sup>42</sup> Harding v. Collazo, 223 Cal. Rptr. 329 (Cal. App. 1986) (Appellate court noting with apparent approval multiple opportunities to amend provided by trial court-).

<sup>43</sup> Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 106 (1976).

<sup>44</sup> Hughes v. Rowe, 449 U.S. 5, 9-10 (1980); Breck v. Ulmer, supra, 745 P.2d at 75 (Alaska Supreme Court discusses issue); Nelson v. Gaunt, supra, 178 Cal. Rptr. 167 (California Appeals Court discusses misuse of term in appeal.); Baske v. Burke, 177 Cal. Rptr. 794 (Cal. App. 1981) (letter to judge included sufficient information to be deemed an answer-).

<sup>45</sup> Breck v. Ulmer, supra, 745 P.2d at 75 (Alaska holds failure held not prejudicial); See also, Hudson v. Hardy, 412 F.2d 1091 (D.C. ~~Circuit Cir.~~ 1968). The federal cases are collected at Gray, supra, 29, n. 151.

<sup>46</sup> Keating v. Traynor, 833 P.2d 695, 696 (Alaska 1992).

respond.<sup>47</sup> The state also requires explanation of how to comply with discovery requests prior to dismissal for failure to do so.<sup>48</sup>

California has reversed as an abuse of discretion a refusal to vacate a judgment when that judgment resulted from a litigant's misunderstanding of court correspondence,<sup>49</sup> and set aside a default judgment, even when the set aside request was filed late on the basis that the court had failed to treat a letter to the judge as an answer.<sup>50</sup>

C. What Judges Must Not Do:

Deny rights to self-represented litigants because of that status

Judges can not penalize a litigant for not having a lawyer. For example, the Connecticut Supreme Court reversed a case in which the trial court had not allowed a litigant access to certain papers because that litigant did not have a lawyer.<sup>51</sup>

In effect act as counsel/advocate for self-represented litigants

This might happen, for example, when the complexity of the issue, or the need to develop underlying facts, is such that the judge could not avoid becoming the advocate for the self-represented litigant.<sup>52</sup> Examples (not necessarily to be followed in all states) include the judge personally amending self-represented litigant's pleadings on the judge's own motion to defeat a motion to dismiss<sup>53</sup>

---

<sup>47</sup> Bauman v. DFYS, 768 P.2d 1097 (Alaska 1989). "To require a judge to instruct a pro se litigant as to each step in litigating a claim would compromise the court's impartiality in deciding the case by forcing the judge to act as an advocate for one side." Id., ~~768 P.2d~~ at 1099. In Sopko v. Dowell Schlumberger, Inc., ~~supra~~, 21 P.3d at 1273, the Alaska Supreme Court summarized its cases: "We have imposed some limited duties on courts to advise pro se litigants of proper procedure, [including] . . . the duty to inform . . . (1) of specific procedural defects, . . . and (2) of the necessity of opposing a summary judgment motion with affidavits or by amending the complaint."

<sup>48</sup> Gilbert v. Nina Plaza Condo Association, 64 P.-3d 126, 129 (Alaska ~~2003~~)

<sup>49</sup> Gamet v. Blanchard, 111 Cal. Rptr.2d 439, 445 (Cal. App. 2001)

<sup>50</sup> Baske v. Burke, 177 Cal. Rptr. 794 (Cal. App. 1981).

<sup>51</sup> Cersosimo v. Cersosimo, 449 A.2d 1026 (Conn. 1982)

<sup>52</sup> Lombardi v. Citizens Nat. Trust & Sav. Bank, 289 P.2d 823 (Cal. App. 1955) (Complexities of dead man's statute made requested assistance impossible; "This is not a case where a few suggestions on the part of the trial judge would have solved plaintiff's difficulty. Had it been such, the trial judge would undoubtedly have followed the customary practice and offered appropriate suggestions.")

Conclusion

While there is significant variety among the states, as a general matter the broad range of discretion granted to judges in their handling of cases involving self-represented litigants allows them to manage their courtroom in a manner that addresses concerns about access to justice for the self-represented without fear of reversal (on those grounds) or of judicial discipline.

Moreover, this is an area of the law in which practice, insight, and understanding are rapidly changing. There is every reason to believe that appellate courts are becoming progressively sensitive to the needs of access to justice.<sup>54</sup>

---

<sup>53</sup> Paulsen v. Evander, 633 So.2d 540, 541 (Fl. ~~5th Dist. Ct. of~~ App. 1994) (the case makes clear that it would be appropriate for the judge to explain the ruling, even if that assisted the litigant in amending the pleading themselves-).

<sup>54</sup> See, e.g., Elkins v. Superior Court of Contra Costa, ~~—163 P.-3d —160 (Ca.~~ 2007) ~~(released August 6, 2007)~~ (rejecting local rules that required parties to submit their case in written form; finding abuse of discretion to apply local rules to cut off access to justice; importance of access for public trust in the courts; ruling duty to structure courts for access, notwithstanding resource problems-).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Addendum
Proposed Amendments to
ABA Model Code of
Judicial Conduct

Relating to Self-Represented Litigants

Proposed, on her own behalf,
By Chief Justice Karla Gray, Montana Supreme Court

(New language, relative to February, 2007 ABA on-line version, is underlined)

TERMINOLOGY

Addition to alphabetical listing (at page 3)

“Nonprejudicial” denotes steps taken by a judge to ensure the case is decided on the facts and the law. See Canon 2 and Rule 2.2, Rule 2.3 and Comment, Rule 2.5 and Comment and Rule 2.6 and Comment.

CANON 2

Rule 2.2 Impartiality and fairness (at page 12)

A judge shall uphold and apply the law*, and shall perform all duties of judicial office fairly and impartially; a judge’s discretionary nonprejudicial procedural steps to provide self-represented litigants the opportunity to have their cases fully heard do not raise a reasonable question about the judge’s impartiality.

Removal of Comment to Rule 2.2 (at page 12)

~~[4] It is not a violation of this Rule for a judge to make reasonable accommodations to ensure pro se litigants the opportunity to have their matters fairly heard.~~

Rule 2.3 Bias, Prejudice, and Harassment (at page 13)

(E) A judge is not precluded from taking discretionary nonprejudicial steps, consistent with the law, to enable a self-represented litigant to be heard.

Rule 2.5: Administrative Competence and Diligence (at page 14)

(B) A judge shall cooperate with other judges and court officials in the administration of court business, which may include improvements in access to justice.

Additional Comment to Rule 2.5 (at page 15)

[5] The rapid growth in litigation involving self-represented litigants and increasing awareness of the significance of the courts' role in promoting access to justice have led to additional flexibility by judges and other court officials in many areas, including participation in innovations designed to facilitate a self-represented litigant's ability to be heard.

Rule 2.6: Ensuring the right to be heard (at page 15)

(A) A judge shall accord to every person who has a legal interest in a proceeding, or that person's lawyer, the right to be heard according to law*, and may take affirmative nonprejudicial steps, consistent with the law, as the judge deems appropriate in enabling a self-represented litigant to be heard.

Additional Comment to Rule 2.6 (at page 15)

[2] By way of illustration, among the affirmative nonprejudicial steps that individual judges have found helpful in advancing a self-represented litigant's ability to be heard have been: liberally construing pleadings; providing brief information about the proceeding and evidentiary and foundational requirements; limited questioning of witnesses; modifying the traditional order of taking evidence; refraining from using legal jargon; explaining the basis for a ruling; and making referrals to any resources available to assist the litigant in the preparation of the case.

[2] and [3] renumbered.

Chapter 4: Solutions for Evidentiary Challenges

Introduction	4-1
I. Admit Evidence Where Appropriate, Fair, and Consistent With the Law	4-1
II. Admissibility and Weight	4-23
III. The Formal General Rules of Evidence	4-3
A. Evidence Admitted Without Objection	4-4
B. Much Evidence Is Self-Admitting	4-4
C. A Judge Can Make Material Objection	4-4
D. Foundational Weight and Admissibility of Evidence	4-5
E. Weight and Credibility Are for the Fact-Finder	4-5
F. On Appeal, Judges Are Generally Assumed to Have Known and Correctly Followed the Law	4-5
IV. These Principles Give Judges Great Discretion	4-53
Conclusion	4-63

4

Solutions for Evidentiary Challenges

Introduction

A critical component of judging is managing the receipt of evidence. As a practical matter, judges find that they often end up asking evidentiary questions of the parties, establishing the foundational facts for evidence, explaining what is needed for evidence to be admitted, and asking questions designed to clarify the weight to be given to the evidence.

However, judges often feel torn. On the one hand, they feel compelled to make sure that they hear all that they need to hear to decide the case fairly; both in terms of the totality of the evidence and the information about that evidence that lets them decide what weight to give it. On the other hand, they fear putting their hand on one side of the scales of justice as well as being possibly inconsistent with the governing substantive and procedural rules of evidence. Most state's case law is clear that judges may not dispense with the rules of evidence in cases involving self-represented litigants.<sup>55</sup>

This chapter is intended to underline the broad range of judicial discretion in the regulation of evidence, and to emphasize the implications for the flexibility granted to the trial judge in matters of evidence in self represented litigant cases. Citations are to the Federal Rules of Evidence,<sup>56</sup> but it can not be overemphasized that state law may vary, and, of course, controls in the state courts.

I. Admit Evidence Where Appropriate, Fair, and Consistent With the Law

---

<sup>55</sup> See, cases cited Albrecht, Greacen, Hough and Zorza, Judicial Techniques for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants, 42 JUDGES' JOURNAL 7 16 (Spring 2003), <sup>56</sup> Many states have available tables comparing the Federal Rules to those that apply in that state.

Formatted: Font: Italic

In these cases, a judge has three core goals:

1. To hear as much as appropriately possible about the case to reach a just and reliable outcome;<sup>57</sup>
2. To do so in a way that is consistent with the law; and
3. To do so in a way that is fair and is seen by the public as fair and as the product of a fair process.

II. Admissibility and Weight

These goals require that the following take place:

1. As much evidence as possible should be heard, provided that evidence is appropriate;
2. Evidence is not appropriate, that is, should not be considered, if it is not reliable, in the sense that it should not be given any weight;<sup>58</sup>
3. Evidence may not also be appropriate, and therefore not considered, because of other policy goals.<sup>59</sup> Generally,

---

<sup>57</sup> This chapter frequently refers to “appropriate” evidence rather than the technical term “admissible” evidence, since it is attempting to provide practical guidance that is consistent with technical requirements and, indeed, to show that commonsense approaches will lead to results that comply with those requirements. (In some cases, as discussed below, evidence may well not be technically “admissible” had there been formal objection, but is not inappropriate or harmful and can be considered without that objection.)

If judges focus on the appropriateness of evidence, they will find that they are not in violation of technical rules governing the overall admission and consideration of evidence. However, while it may be appropriate to consider evidence that in a different procedural context might be excludable, nothing in this benchguide recommends the admission of evidence that would be inadmissible in the procedural context under discussion.

<sup>58</sup> In the relatively rare case of a self-represented litigant trying a case before a jury, evidence should also be excluded if it is prejudicial, in the sense that it will do more harm than good to the fact-finding process, because the jury will be prejudiced by it. If the case is before a judge, the judge is assumed to be able to avoid such prejudice.

<sup>59</sup> See, generally, FED. R. EVID. 404 (character evidence); FED. R. EVID. 404 (subsequent, remedial measures); FED. R. EVID. 408 (compromise); Fed. R. Evid. 409 (medical and similar expenses); FED. R. EVID. (plea, etc); FED. R. EVID. 411 (insurance); FED. R. EVID. 411 (sex offense cases, victim prior behavior);

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Small caps

receipt of such evidence notwithstanding its being subject to exclusion is less harmful than in circumstances in which exclusion relates to reliability (although to admit it over objection would be directly inconsistent with the rules of evidence);<sup>60</sup>

4. The fact-finder needs to have enough information to be able to decide the reliability and weight of each bit of evidence;<sup>61</sup> and
5. The processes must be consistent with the rules of evidence and procedure.

Judges need to find a process that meets these goals and reflects the way we see the legal system as a whole. Creating a special set of rules for self-represented litigant cases would be counterproductive. In the end, public trust and confidence in the legal system depends on decisions in all kinds of cases being made on commonsense grounds that are understandable by laypeople.

III. The Formal General Rules of Evidence

At first glance, it might appear that for a judge to meet the fact-finding goals described above would be difficult, particularly given the complexity of the rules of evidence.

However, as a practical matter, as the detailed analysis below shows, the general rules for the taking of evidence make the task much easier and, in fact, render most of the specific and hypertechnical rules largely irrelevant in day-to-day practice.

---

<sup>60</sup> Such evidence is subject to exclusion for policy rather than reliability reasons. Examples include the rules dealing with prior criminal convictions (Fed. R. Evid. 404) and those with subsequent repairs (Fed. R. Evid. 407). The failure to exclude such evidence means that the policy underlying the rule of exclusion is undercut, but the core truth-finding goal is not. If the rule is that such evidence is admitted without objection that represents in part a conclusion that the harm is less great than if the evidence should be excluded regardless of objection. (If only one side has an attorney, there is a residual potential unfairness under this model, in that it allows a judge to permit into evidence in a self-represented litigant case evidence that would be excluded were competent counsel present, or if the self-represented litigant objected. This imbalance is generally not present if neither party has counsel.)

<sup>61</sup> When there are lawyers present, the process of challenge, impeachment, and argument gives the judge the information he or she needs to make this decision. When there are no lawyers that information must come from a different process.

Moreover, to the extent that the technical rules do constrain judges in self-represented litigant cases, this constraint is usually very much in the direction of commonsense notions governing the weight to be given to the evidence.

A. Evidence Admitted Without Objection

If evidence offered by a self-represented litigant is not objected to, that evidence generally comes in for all purposes.<sup>62</sup> Given that most self-represented litigants do not object, at least in the formal terms that objections require, most evidence is admissible and may be given such weight as the judge deems appropriate. The exceptions to this rule of admission without objection tend not to be technical rules but to deal with individual instances of very limited and obvious areas of highly prejudicial evidence.

B. Much Evidence Is Self-Admitting

Many forms of narrative testimony contain the foundation for their own admissibility, even if objected to. Many hearsay narratives, for example, contain a description of the circumstances from which the judge can determine that they meet foundational requirements. Some statements are clearly from their own context or content against interest,<sup>63</sup> or of family history.<sup>64</sup> Others are statements of mental or physical state,<sup>65</sup> or are business records.<sup>66</sup>

Similarly, many documents when offered as part of a narrative will meet foundational requirements, even if challenged or deemed challenged.

C. A Judge Can Make Material Objection

The fact that evidence is not objected to does not mean that the judge has to admit it.

---

<sup>62</sup> FED. R. EVID. 103.

<sup>63</sup> FED. R. EVID. 804 (b)(3).

<sup>64</sup> FED. R. EVID. 804 (b)(4).

<sup>65</sup> FED. R. EVID. 803(3).

<sup>66</sup> FED. R. EVID. 803(6).

- Formatted: Small caps

The judge is free to choose to act as if an objection had been made.<sup>67</sup>

D. Foundational Weight and Admissibility of Evidence

The judge can find out all that needs to be found out both in terms of the formal admissibility of the evidence and the weight to be given that evidence if admitted.

There is nothing nonneutral, or any prohibition in the rules, in the judge's determining whether evidence offered is admissible, or in the judge exploring what weight to give it.

E. Weight and Credibility Are for the Fact-Finder

Unless clearly barred, most evidence is admissible in these circumstances.<sup>68</sup> Moreover, weight and credibility are for the fact-finder, which in self-represented litigant cases is usually the judge.

F. On Appeal, Judges Are Generally Assumed to Have Known and Correctly Followed the Law

In an appeal, the burden is on the appellant to show that the trial judge was in error, and the burden is on the losing party to make sure that the record shows that error.

For example, if evidence is admissible only for a limited purpose, the judge will be assumed to know this, and to have followed the rule, even if there was a general objection to the evidence. In other words, a judge will not be found to be in error for failing to exclude such evidence, provided it can be admitted for some purpose.<sup>69</sup>

IV. These Principles Give Judges Great Discretion

---

<sup>67</sup> WIGMORE ON EVIDENCE, §18, p 790 (Tillers Revision, 1983) (“The judge may on his own motion deal with offered evidence. . .”) See, Fed. R. Evid. 103 (d) dealing with appeal, “nothing in this rule precludes notice of plain errors affecting substantial rights, although they were not brought to the attention of the court.”

<sup>68</sup> FED. R. EVID. 402 (“All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided . . .”)

<sup>69</sup> McGlauglin, WEINSTEIN'S FEDERAL EVIDENCE, § 103.12 [4] (2nd ed.) and cases cited.

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Small caps

Generally, it is totally proper for judges to find out all they need to about the evidence that is offered, to then admit it or not admit it, and to give it the weight they feel it deserves.

Conclusion

The rules of evidence therefore provide no barrier to judges using their discretion to obtaining, considering, and giving appropriate weight to the evidence they need to hear to decide cases fairly and completely.

Chapter 6 of this benchguide provides examples of specific “scripts” that may help achieve these goals in particular situations.

Chapter 5: Caseflow Management

Introduction	5-13
I. Caseflow Management Depends on Effective Systems	5-13
II. Assistance to Self-Represented Litigants	5-3
III. Calendar Management	5-43
A. The Court Should Determine the Pace	5-43
B. Controlling Calendar Size	5-53
C. Effective Calendaring—Specialized Calendars	5-63
D. Minimizing the Number of Appearances in Each Case— Reducing Unnecessary Continuances	5-73
E. Marshaling Court and Community Resources	5-8
IV. Facilities and Technology	5-103
A. Courtroom Facilities	5-11
B. Technology	5-113
V. Staffing Issues	5-123
A. Self-Help Assistance in the Courtroom	5-12
B. Court Staff	5-14
VI. Judicial Education	5-14

- A. Mentor Judges 5-15
- B. Court-Employed Attorneys 5-15
- C. Continuing Education 5-16

Conclusion

5-163

5

Caseflow Management

Introduction

Effective caseflow management for cases involving self-represented litigants requires that judges work proactively as members of a larger court system. The complexity of self-represented jurisprudence demands careful attention to the interdependence of the different parts of court operations. It requires thought about how to best protect the rights of all litigants regardless of whether they have attorneys.

I. Caseflow Management Depends on Effective Systems

The roles of file clerks, data input, records management, information systems and technology, court operations, supervision, management and administration, court investigation, mediation, research attorneys, self-help attorneys, and paralegal staff affect how well a courtroom operates. For example, calendar management starts for the self-represented litigant at the clerk's window when papers are first filed. Litigants who have been treated courteously and helpfully by the court staff are far less fearful and angry when they arrive for their court hearings. This holds true for each encounter litigants have with court staff prior to their hearing, whether with clerks, mediators, or self-help center attorneys.

The way in which each component of court operations works is also critical to the effective management of the judge's calendar. For example, decisions about filing, records management, calendaring systems, information systems, and data collection can have serious consequences on the daily operation of the courtroom, and input from judges and courtroom staff must be incorporated throughout the development of such systems.

Some examples of the types of systemic caseflow management issues important for judges to consider are the following:

1. Court-based assistance for self-represented litigants;
2. Calendar management;
3. Docket control;
4. Reduction of unnecessary continuances;
5. Facilities and technology;
6. Staffing;
7. Continuing education;
8. Creating opportunities for early comprehensive dispute resolution;
9. Creating procedural uniformity throughout the court; and
10. Developing mechanisms to serve litigants needing an interpreter or accommodations to deal with disabilities.

Judges should not shy away from participation in regular meetings with their own court staff and with staff from other court operations. Judges and staff should meet regularly, become familiar with each other's roles and how they interact, develop an ability to solve problems as they arise, and strategize to improve efficiency. Staffs from different departments meet in various combinations to address specific needs at specific times, but the goal is to maintain good lines of communication within the system as a whole. When meetings within the court system are run well, they can significantly improve a judge's ability to manage a calendar with self-represented litigants in the most effective way possible.

It is often extremely helpful to meet regularly with self-help attorneys and others providing assistance to self-represented litigants to identify issues that may not be raised in bench-bar and other meetings. It is also helpful to set up a system of communication with legal services and other agencies who frequent the court or whose client population appears often. For example, a domestic violence clinic may have input about how existing systems are affecting their clients and have ideas for improvement. Community-based providers, especially in immigrant communities, may have valuable feedback from their clients about barriers.

II. Assistance to Self-Represented Litigants

One principal problem for both the court and the self-represented litigant is the litigant's unfamiliarity with the court's procedures for setting hearings and otherwise moving cases from filing to resolution. Many litigants assume that the court will schedule all necessary hearings and inform them of what they need to do at each. In fact, court rules often require the litigant to take the initiative to move a case forward.

Courts in many states have found that providing information and education to self-represented litigants benefits both the public and the courts. This has been addressed in several ways:

1. Self-Help Centers. Court-based self-help centers have been implemented in many states to provide assistance to self-represented litigants in family law as well as in probate matters such as guardianship, conservatorship, and small estates and other areas of civil litigation including landlord/tenant, civil harassment, consumer issues, and small claims. Some provide assistance with traffic matters and expungement of criminal records.<sup>70</sup>
2. Courts Online Websites and Self-Help Centers. Such Web sites provides a great deal of information for litigants able and willing to go online to access it. Courts often publish their local rules, forms and additional information on their court Web site.<sup>71</sup>
3. Pamphlets and Checklists. Most courts find it necessary to supplement the electronic information with printed pamphlets or checklists available at the courthouse (typically in the self-help center or clerk's office). Some courts go further, actually handing summary information packets, or letters from the presiding or supervising judge, to litigants at the time of filing of every new complaint or petition.<sup>72</sup>

---

<sup>70</sup> A directory of over 130 such Self Help Centers spread throughout the United States entitled, A Directory of Court-Based Self Help Programs can be found online at <http://www.ncsconline.org/WC/Publications/ProSe/contents.htm>.

<sup>71</sup> www.lawhelp.org, the national network of access to justice websites, provides links to many of these court sites. Many are also listed in the directory referenced in the above footnote.

A typical checklist might include information about the following:

1. Service of process;
2. Filing an answer or response;
3. Alternative dispute resolution processes available;
4. Disclosure requirements and discovery options;
5. Obtaining a default judgment;
6. Filing motions;
7. Requesting hearing or trial settings; and
8. Special requirements for particular case types, such as mandatory parenting courses and mandatory mediation of contested child custody and visitation matters.

Some courts require the plaintiff or petitioner to provide a copy of the packet or checklist to the opposing party as part of the service of process.

III. Calendar Management

A. The Court Should Determine the Pace

Courts have found that, even with explicit instructions on the need to request a court hearing and how to do so, many or even most self-represented litigants fail to schedule the hearings needed to complete their cases. Consequently, many courts have found that it is much more effective for the courts to schedule the hearings themselves. For example, a status conference or case classification conference in all divorce cases is set a certain number of days (usually 90, 120, 150, or 180) after the filing of the petition. The court provides notice of the hearing to all parties and, on the date of the hearing, determines what progress has been made, makes whatever rulings are possible, decides <sup>72</sup> For examples of materials developed by local courts see www.selfhelpsupport.org and the California AOC's Equal Access Program's compilation of instructional materials from California courts at <http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/programs/equalaccess/instmat.htm>.

---

what further steps will be needed, and schedules those steps with the parties.<sup>73</sup>

As part of this process, the court provides detailed instructions to the parties about the specific tasks they must perform prior to the next hearing. At the close of every hearing, the court sets the date of the next hearing, if necessary, and gives the parties a written notice of the date, time, and purpose of the hearing.

Many courts have also found it effective to assume responsibility for preparing orders and judgments in cases in which both parties are self-represented. In many instances they are prepared in the courtroom by courtroom clerks, based on the judge's directions. In other instances, orders and judgments are prepared by family law facilitators, self-help center staff, pro bono lawyers, or community volunteers.

B. Controlling Calendar Size

Docket size in calendars with large numbers of self-represented litigants should be restricted to a reasonable number of matters, allowing litigants the time and opportunity to present their cases to the judge. Calendars in departments with high numbers of self-represented litigants tend to be too crowded. A careful workload analysis should be conducted to determine the actual workload for courtrooms handling such cases and to set a reasonable cap on the size of the dockets. This should also recognize the amount of additional time required when an interpreter is needed for one party, and even more when both parties require an interpreter.

Setting a cap should not lead to longer waiting times for hearings but point to the need for additional judicial resources for the self-represented workload. While effective case management techniques such as the use of a differentiated calendar system (as discussed below) can help with efficiency and reduce stress on judges and courtroom personnel, an evaluation of reasonable workload levels and appropriate allocation of judicial and other resources is critical. Inequitable distribution of workload among judges leads to high levels of stress in certain assignments and characterization of those assignments as undesirable and of low status in the judicial hierarchy.

---

<sup>73</sup> For California examples of these materials see the California AOC's Equal Access Program's compilation of family law caseflow management materials from the courts at <http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/programs/equalaccess/family.htm>.

C. Effective Calendaring—Specialized Calendars

Organizing calendar settings so that like matters are heard together can improve efficiency because it allows focusing of resources and more accurate estimating of time needed.

This form of calendar organization makes it much easier to establish appropriate calendar size according to the issues to be heard, and it can reduce the stress on judges by making each calendar more predictable. This calendar strategy clusters cases with similar or limited issues together for hearings.

1. Self-represented litigant calendars;
2. Traffic calendars clustered by type of ticket and fine;
3. Default calendar;
4. Domestic violence hearings with child-related issues;
5. Domestic violence hearings without children involved;
6. Motions related to custody/visitation only;
7. Motions with child support issues only;
8. Law and motion calendars for jurisdictional and other matters; and
9. Review hearings.

By setting similar cases together, the court can make efficient use of staff and community volunteers. For example, in a family law court, if a judge sets all reviews of supervised visitation on a specific afternoon, the supervised visitation provider(s) can be available at that time to help get new parents signed up who had not previously been able to accomplish this task. Clustering the cases in this way maximizes the availability of this particular community provider to both the court and the litigants.

Self-Represented Litigant Calendars. Many judges have found that both the court and the litigants benefit from calendars devoted exclusively to cases that do not involve lawyers. The most important benefit is the ability to assemble staff and volunteer support for these calendars. A second major benefit is eliminating the stress of calendars with both represented and unrepresented cases.

Courts with self-represented litigant calendars differ in their categorization of cases involving one represented and one unrepresented litigant. Some judges prefer to treat them together with cases with both sides unrepresented, finding that the self-represented litigants in these cases often benefit from the resources assembled for those calendars and from the general instructions for all self-represented litigants at the beginning of the calendar as well as learning from watching others on the calendar ahead of them. Others prefer to include them on calendars in which lawyers represent both sides.

When calendars contain both represented and self-represented cases, some judges call the self-represented cases first, as their matters often take less time and attorneys can be working to settle cases. Others call attorney cases first in an effort to minimize the time spent by lawyers waiting in the courtroom, and hence the cost of their services to their clients. Some judges will call cases with “model” attorneys as a way to help educate litigants about the court process and appropriate behaviors.

D. Minimizing the Number of Appearances in Each Case— Reducing Unnecessary Continuances

The court has a strong interest in holding to the appropriate minimum the number of court appearances in each case; this is true for cases involving represented as well as unrepresented litigants. The fewer the number of hearings, the less time required of judges, courtroom staff, and clerk’s office clerical staff in scheduling, pulling files for, conducting, and preparing minute orders for those hearings.

Self-represented litigants share the same interest: the fewer the number of hearings, the fewer appointments they need to keep track of, the fewer days of work they miss, the fewer child care arrangements they need to make and pay for, the fewer trips they must make to the courthouse, and the less anxiety they experience. One of the strongest incentives for self-represented litigants to reach agreement on contested issues is the opportunity to resolve the case and avoid having to come to court again.

Many courts therefore attempt to resolve cases involving self-represented litigants on their first day in court. The court staff and volunteers assist the litigants to settle their cases and to prepare whatever paperwork is needed to present the matter for resolution by a judicial officer.

Judges report that court-based self-help assistance to self-represented litigants saves valuable courtroom time and reduces the number of continuances because of procedural defects.<sup>74</sup> Assistance results in the litigants and the court having the following:

1. Complete and accurate paperwork;
2. Adequate supporting documentation;
3. Knowledge of the kind of information the judge needs to hear; and
4. Greater ability to focus on relevant issues during the hearing.

E. Marshaling Court and Community Resources

To make the best use of the judge's time on the bench, courts assemble teams of court staff and volunteers from agencies and community organizations to assist litigants with reviewing paperwork, resolving issues, and preparing documents to dispose of cases. Examples of the sorts of resources brought to bear include the following:

1. Self-help center staff;
2. Family court facilitator(s);
3. Family court services mediators prepared to conduct "same day" or emergency mediation sessions;
4. Clerk's office staff;
5. Legal services attorneys and staff;
6. Volunteer attorneys;

---

<sup>74</sup> For the formal California report of this impact, see, Judicial Council of California/Administrative Office of the Court, A Report to the California Legislature: Family Law Information Centers: An Evaluation of Three Pilot Programs (March 1, 2003). Available online at <http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/programs/cfcc/pdf/FLICfinal.pdf>

7. Volunteer private mediators;
8. Volunteer forensic accountants;
9. Law professors and volunteer law students from a local law school clinic;
10. Court interpreter(s);
11. Student interpreters from a local university interpreter certification program;
12. High school and college student volunteers;
13. Community volunteers (including retired persons);
14. Parental abduction attorneys;
15. Domestic violence restraining order advocate(s);
16. Drug treatment program staff;
17. Domestic violence program staff;
18. Supervised visitation program staff;
19. Guardianship clinic staff; and
20. Child Protective Services liaisons.

The court uses these resources to assess the case's status; provide information on needed paperwork; help prepare missing, incomplete, or incorrect documents; conduct settlement negotiations with the parties; and write up agreements for presentation in court. Some judges ask some of their staff to be present in the courtroom for calendars involving large numbers of self-represented litigants.

The following report from a family law judge in a small county underscores the importance of adequate resource support.

I have found that now that I have enough people helping me in the family law department, I really don't have any serious case management issues.

We have the following people who either are in court or will immediately respond: two clerks, a parental abduction attorney, two mediators, the facilitator, the domestic violence restraining order advocates, and a court staff member who acts as a resource specialist and handles any orders or filings that are not taken care of by the domestic violence advocates or the facilitator.

We have further help in managing the pro per litigants from the Domestic Violence Clinic attorneys from the law school, Unified Family Court therapists, the Family Court Children's Fund, the family resource center for supervised visitation, a volunteer panel of experienced family law attorneys for settlement conferences, a CPS immediate response contact, and the Guardianship Clinic. We also have the Unified Family Court manager and the Unified Family Court clerks who prepare the Yellow File so that we know all the facts about the parties present in court.

This direct assistance can also be extremely rewarding to the volunteers who participate in these calendars, as they are time-limited, discrete services with the opportunity to see immediate benefits.

Volunteer work for the court balances what we do as professionals in our private practices and brings more than a modicum of satisfaction. There is nothing more gratifying than unknotting a technical question that allows a pro per litigant to get the dissolution done there and then. This contrasts with the complicated legal issues and complicated legal personalities that we have to grapple with day in and day out in our private practices. I would do it every month for the court if it were possible. It keeps me sane!

—Pro bono attorney on self-represented litigant calendar

IV. Facilities and Technology

A. Courtroom Facilities

A courtroom should be able to comfortably hold all the litigants who appear for hearing on the calendar. Litigants forced to wait in the hallway may not hear their case called and may thus miss their hearing. They will also not have the benefit of “seeing how it is done” and learning from observing others. Overcrowding detracts from the public’s sense that the court is concerned about litigants’ legal rights. It also tends to increase whatever anxiety levels already exist among the litigants, who are now crowded and uncomfortable in addition to being nervous about their cases.

If the litigants cannot fit into the courtroom, the judge should bring this fact to the attention of the court executive officer immediately.

Moreover, an effective self-represented litigant courtroom operation requires additional courthouse space. If courtroom support staff such as self-help attorneys, mediators, or volunteers are available to provide assistance, there must be some place for them to work with the litigants other than in the hallways, waiting areas, or stairwells. Some courts have constructed as many as a dozen small conference rooms immediately adjacent to the courtroom for day-of-appearance assistance meetings between litigants and resource persons.

B. Technology

Courtroom Technology. Courts need access to good technology in order to operate well. For example, a courtroom should have access to any electronic data system available and case registry or case management systems.

Any given calendar can be adversely affected by the breakdown or lack of necessary technology in a courtroom. Staff preparing orders after hearings must have easy access to computers and copy machines. Staff running guideline child support calculations during settlement discussions with litigants must have access to computers and printers. Providing staff with appropriate Internet access to legal information, and to court data needed to ascertain the status of cases, or to identify related cases, is critical. Lack of simple, effective technology will seriously impede the courtroom's efficiency.

Beyond the Courtroom. Courts have taken advantage of automation in many creative ways, including the following:<sup>75</sup>

1. Informational Web sites to provide full access to procedural information.
2. Document assembly systems to enable self-represented litigants to create court forms online and print them for filing or presentation in court.
3. Word-processing macros for completing standard court orders and judgments.
4. Using share drives on which Family Court Services staff can post draft parenting plans so that they are available to the judge electronically in the event changes are needed in the plan following a hearing.

V. Staffing Issues

Caseflow management is made more efficient by thoughtful consideration of the training and qualities most beneficial for court staff working most closely with self-represented litigants.

A. Self-Help Assistance in the Courtroom

Providing this assistance requires significant advance planning, including the following:

1. Organization of the staff and volunteers to ensure that adequate personnel are present, that they have clear expectations concerning their roles, sufficient training to perform them competently, and are appropriately supervised by qualified attorneys;
2. Development of procedures for self-represented litigant assistance in cases without a lawyer on either side, including triaging processes for determining what assistance is needed and appropriate and when to refer litigants into the courtroom because further staff effort is not warranted;

---

<sup>75</sup> See examples of these resources at www.selfhelpsupport.org and on the California AOC's Equal Access Program Web site at <http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/programs/equalaccess/techres.htm>.

3. Developing procedures for handling litigants who need interpreter services or additional assistance;
4. Refinement of those processes for cases involving one represented and one unrepresented litigant;
5. Development of checklists and fillable forms for the use of litigants and resource people in the assistance process;
6. Development of a process for litigants to check in, to be assigned to a staff person or volunteer, and to be taken to a physical location where they can work on their case with relative privacy and access to needed computers;
7. Development of a process for referring cases to the courtroom when they are ready for bench officer review or when staff are unable to help the self-represented party or parties to advance their cases; and
8. Development of a process for referring cases from the courtroom back to the resource staff for posthearing consultation and document preparation.

It is wonderful to work collaboratively with the courts and the private bar to develop a system that provides self-represented litigants real assistance to finalize their divorce or paternity cases. Most of these persons do not need to hire lawyers but are overwhelmed by the legal forms and procedures. I feel immensely satisfied that we are helping these people move on with their lives while giving them a positive look at the court system.

—Pro bono attorney volunteer

There needs to be a clear understanding of the critical necessity for the court to be neutral, thus providing assistance to all litigants and maintaining the appearance of neutrality in all matters.

B. Court Staff

Formal education and training programs for court staff should be established if not already in place, and reviewed if existent for possible expansion. As clerks, both at the filing window and in the courtroom, are asked to give self-represented litigants more information, they should be provided with increased education to expand their base of legal information.

The demeanor of the courtroom clerk, bailiff/court attendant, court reporter, and supporting staff and volunteers is important to the impressions that self-represented litigants receive of the court. The judge should make it clear to these individuals that they are expected to treat litigants with dignity and respect. Joking between judges, clerks, and, indeed, any staff about the litigants during breaks or at other times should be discouraged. Staff joking or being familiar with attorneys may create the impression that they have an inside track or access to the court that the self-represented litigant lacks. Such conduct contributes to a culture of discourtesy and all too easily escalates to the level of an impermissible ex parte communication. Just as the staff rightfully expects that the judge will protect them from abusive behavior by the public, so do the litigants have a right to expect respectful treatment from the judge's staff.

Of equal importance is the ability of the staff to set boundaries with the litigants, and to do so without being rude or dismissive. If a courtroom clerk is rude to litigants, for example, before the judge takes the bench, a judge will encounter an unnecessarily hostile courtroom environment that he or she must then overcome during the proceedings.

Courtrooms with large numbers of self-represented litigants benefit from experienced staff confident in their skills. Patience and a sense of humor are also genuinely helpful.

VI. Judicial Education

One way to assist judges in feeling comfortable and being effective in the courtroom is to provide appropriate judicial education. Knowledge of the law relevant to their assignment is absolutely critical for judges in assignments with high percentages of self-represented litigants. Without attorneys to brief or present the legal issues, judges must be aware of applicable legal arguments and do their own research. In many cases, departments with large numbers of self-represented litigants have heavy dockets and do not have research attorney resources allocated to them. It is up to the judge not just to know the law but to be able to apply it quickly and accurately.

Previous subject matter experience on the bench or in law practice is an enormous benefit for a judge handling cases with self-represented litigants, but assigning a judge with prior expertise is not always possible. Some ways to provide support for judges include mentor judges, both official and unofficial.

A. Mentor Judges

Official mentors. To help new judges adjust to their roles as judges, many courts provide them with official mentor judges. Certainly, part of that mentoring should include assistance with referrals to educational resources in the subject area of a new judge's assignment—particularly when it requires working with large numbers of self-represented litigants.

Unofficial mentors. It is also highly beneficial for judges to have their own unofficial mentor judges who are simply colleagues they know and trust to provide them with good counsel on various professional topics. Talking with a judge who previously held the assignment or a colleague currently handling the same types of cases in another department, or even in a similar-sized county, can help relieve isolation and increase subject matter expertise.

Lists of expert judges. As part of a regular bench orientation, some courts have published a list of areas of expertise of the members of the bench so that a new judge may call on a colleague with specialized knowledge.

B. Court-Employed Attorneys

Research attorneys. Research attorneys are an excellent resource for judges in assignments with high percentages of self-represented litigants. This is a rational allocation of resources, given the size of the dockets in many of these departments.

C. Continuing Education

In addition to new judges orientation, California, as do most states, provides continuing education for judges. Continuing education is particularly important because it addresses more complex substantive law matters. Continuing education for the bar programs can be very helpful, as are national programs such as those given by the National Judicial College or the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges. Conferences and nonjudicial meetings held by associations of professionals affiliated with the court often welcome participation by judges who wish to develop expertise.

Many judges find online resources including benchguides and online classes extremely helpful. They can easily get access to the materials and often can find critical resources quickly. The National Center for State Courts has compiled a list of online judicial education resources at <http://www.ncsconline.org/WC/FAQs/JudEduFAQ.htm>.

Conclusion

Integrating caseflow management for the self-represented with the court's overall strategy and approach yields great dividends for the courts, for the self-represented, for those with lawyers, and for lawyers themselves, since it helps guarantee that the court's time is used effectively and that public trust and confidence is maximized.

Chapter 6: Courtroom and Hearing Management

Introduction	6-13
I. Preparation for Hearings	6-1
A. File Review	6-1
B. Staff-Conducted Readiness Reviews	6-2
II. Check-In Procedure	53-5
III. Setting the Tone of the Courtroom	6-6
IV. Roll Calls	6-7
V. Organizing the Cases on a Calendar	6-8
A. Dropping Cases—No Appearance	6-8
B. Moving Party Appears—No Valid Service	6-9
C. Continuance Required	6-10
VI. Referrals to Court and Volunteer Support Staff	6-10
A. Courtroom Self-Help Attorneys	6-10
B. Child Custody Mediators	6-12
C. Volunteers	6-12
VII. Cases Requiring Hearings	6-13
A. Default Hearings	6-13
B. Organizing Contested Hearings	6-14

VIII. Dealing With General Hearing Issues 6-153

- A. Avoiding Dropping Issues 6-15
- B. Getting Needed Information 6-16
- C. Answering Litigants' Questions 6-19
- D. Identifying Elevated Anxiety Levels of Litigants 6-20
- E. Ruling From the Bench 6-21
- F. Providing Written Orders 6-21

IX. Contested Hearings Involving Two Self-Represented Litigants 6-223

X. Contested Hearings Involving One Represented Litigant and One Self-Represented Litigant 6-2434

- A. Proceeding As If the Case Involved Two Self-Represented Litigants 6-25
- B. Asking the Self-Represented Litigant to Present His or Her Case in a Structured Fashion 6-25
- C. Controlling the Courtroom 6-26
- D. Announcing the Ruling and Preparing a Written Order or Judgment 6-27

XI. Scripts and Helpful Phrases for Developing Courtroom Styles 6-27

- A. Sample Preliminary Instructions 6-27
- B. Sample Basic Rules for Evidence Presentation 6-28
- C. Sample List of Elements to Be Proved 6-29

D.	Sample Questions to Elicit Critical Information	6-29
E.	Sample Questions to Establish the Foundational Requirements for Documents and Photographs	6-30
F.	Sample Questions to Establish the Admissibility of Hearsay	6-31
G.	Sample Approach to Swearing Both Parties	6-31
H.	Sample Setting of Ground Rules When One Party Is Represented	6-31
I.	Sample Response to a Resistant Attorney	6-31
J.	Some Generally Helpful Phrases	6-32
K.	Some Sample Nonconfrontational Questions	6-32
L.	Some Ways to Control the Interrupter	6-32
M.	Ways to Recognize and Validate the Litigant	6-33
	Conclusion	6-33

6

Courtroom and Hearing Management

Introduction

The courtroom and hearing are the focus of the whole system. The ultimate test of the success of all of the insights and techniques in this benchguide is whether the self-represented litigant in fact obtains access to justice.

While self-help programs, information, and assistance can be extremely helpful, in the final analysis it is the quality of the process in the courtroom itself that most determines the quality of access that the litigant receives.<sup>76</sup>

I. Preparation for Hearings

Cases involving self-represented litigants benefit from prehearing preparation—both by the judge’s staff and by the judge personally.

A. File Review

Prehearing review of case files greatly facilitates the efficient and effective flow of cases through the calendar. File reviews, however, can also waste a judge’s time when the cases reviewed do not proceed to hearing as initially scheduled. The use of support staff to assess files for readiness (see the next section on staff-conducted readiness reviews) a day or two before scheduled hearings can save significant judicial time. Even when support staffs are unavailable to perform this task, a judge can prioritize which files to review in the greatest detail according to a readiness review strategy.

---

<sup>76</sup> Particular attention is drawn to Appendix One of this Benchguide: Proposed Best Practices for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants reprinted from the American Judicature Society publication, Reaching Out or Overreaching: Judicial Ethics and Self-Represented Litigants.

For example, when it is clear from the pleadings that a case is unlikely to proceed at the time of the hearing, it might not make sense to spend time reading the file in detail. Conversely, if the pleadings appear to be appropriate, and there is a valid proof of service in the file, reading the file seems potentially more useful. Further, if responsive papers have been submitted and there appears to be a good chance of a contested hearing, taking the time for a careful file review would be clearly advisable. The major benefit of readiness assessments is to triage cases for judges to identify which ones require the most preparation, which have outstanding threshold issues that must be dealt with before any hearing can go forward, and which have issues of a type that cause particular concern.

B. Staff-Conducted Readiness Reviews

If possible, staff attorneys or other appropriately trained court staff should review the files and identify a variety of procedural issues for the judge. Checklists are good tools for this. Identifying cases that are unlikely to proceed can save the judge time in his or her own file review and provide guidance for organizing the calendar.

Determining whether cases are ready to proceed will always take place to some extent at the time of the hearing; however, when files have been assessed for readiness prior to hearing so that the judge can begin with good information about the status of pleadings and service for each case on the calendar, disposition of procedural matters is expedited and time for hearings is increased.

Below are some examples of issues that, if identified through a readiness review, can be handled either prior to the hearing date or quickly at the beginning of a calendar, without investing significant court or litigant time.

1. No Proof of Service. Cases in which there is no proof of service, or a defective proof of service, can be identified. As a general case management rule, cases in which there are no proofs of service may be those in which neither party appears for hearing, but this is often not true in cases involving self-represented litigants. These litigants often don't know how to file a proof of service that they have in fact obtained, prior to the hearing, or are unaware of the need to file it in advance. If a proof of service is produced at the hearing, or both parties appear, the matter can proceed; thus, it is wise to review the file prior to the hearing if possible.

2. Pleading Defects. Cases in which there are defects in the pleadings sufficient to prevent a hearing can be identified and brought to the judge's attention. For example, a litigant may have filed a request for relief on the wrong pleading forms, brought the action against an improper party, asked for relief on a matter over which the court has no subject matter jurisdiction within the case at hand, or asked for a decision on a contested trial issue by filing a pretrial motion.

When such issues are identified through a readiness review, a judge can begin the calendar by referring the litigants to the self-help attorney to educate and assist them. In this way the hearing date will not be a waste of time for the court or the parties. Alternatively, if no self-help attorney is available, the judge might call the case at the beginning of the calendar to explain the problem to the litigants rather than make them wait for a long time in the courtroom only to hear that their case will not go forward.

Other procedural problems. Other procedural problems can be identified by readiness reviews. For example, required documentation such as proof of income, proof of completion of a previously court-ordered service, or failure to complete a prehearing requirement such as mandated child custody mediation may be missing. A judge may find that referral to the self-help attorney can solve the problem sufficiently to proceed with the hearing and avoid the need for a continuance. If a continuance is required to allow litigants to produce additional documentation or attend mediation, the case can be called at the beginning of the calendar and handled without the need to keep the parties sitting in the courtroom. It may also be possible for the parties to obtain the needed information from their homes or offices and return to court for the afternoon calendar.

Readiness reviews can also flag particular issues to which the judge may want to pay particular attention and obtain more information before the hearing. The following are examples of such issues:

1. Evidence of an active juvenile dependency case;
2. Possible jurisdictional issues;
3. Evidence of a venue issue;
4. Temporary restraining order set to expire according to its own terms on the day of the hearing;
5. Existence of other cases with potentially conflicting orders;
6. Related cases that might be consolidated sua sponte by the court; and
7. Indication that one or both parties may not be English speakers.

Preparing file cover sheets. For the cases that appear ready for hearing, it is helpful to have certain basic information at hand to avoid having to go back through the file to find the information. This information might be put on a form template attached to the front of the file or put onto the judge's copy of the calendar. The following are examples of basic facts that might be included on file cover sheets:

1. Names of the parties (with phonetic pronunciation);
2. Language or other special needs;
3. Names of children and their ages;
4. Case type (family law, juvenile, guardianship, domestic violence);
5. List of issues for hearing;
6. List of documents relating to the issues set for hearing;
7. Need for interpreter (or other type of accommodation);
8. Whether responsive papers have been filed;
9. Case status—next step to disposition; and
10. Traffic—code section cited and fine.

Tabbing important documents in the file. Tabbing, color coding, or otherwise identifying important documents in a case file can prove helpful during a hearing. This is particularly so in cases with large files or with motions consisting of multiple forms and supporting documents.

II. Check-In Procedure

Noticing litigants to appear 15 to 30 minutes before the judge is to take the bench gives them time to check in with the clerk or bailiff.

It is important to inform the parties in the hearing of the requirement for “early check-in” so that they do not get the impression that the judge is late in taking the bench.

The check-in will ensure that the judge has the most accurate information about who is present for hearings. For example, if no one responds to the judge during the roll call, yet someone has checked in with court staff, a question is raised, and the matter should not be dropped from the calendar without further inquiry. Conversely, if no one responds during roll call, and no one has checked in, the case can be dropped after a reasonable waiting period.

The check-in also allows court staff an opportunity to gather updated information about such things as service of process on cases where questions have been flagged, to provide information to litigants about such matters as mediation reports and recommendations in family law matters, and to provide an opportunity for exchanging any documents requiring pretrial disclosure. It allows staff the opportunity to ascertain whether any of the litigants may be requiring an interpreter. If one is available, staff can call for him or her.

The check-in time also offers an opportunity for the self-represented litigant to ask basic questions of the clerk without interrupting the court. Coming into a courtroom with the judge already present is intimidating, and this check-in time allows litigants to become more comfortable with the courtroom and somewhat calmer when it is their turn to present their case.

The check-in process may actually lead to more extensive intervention if the court has organized a prehearing assistance program for self-represented litigants as described in chapter 5.

III. Setting the Tone of the Courtroom

The judge can set the courtroom’s tone as he or she enters and sits down at the bench. The more relaxed and at ease the judge, the more relaxed and at ease will be the general tone in the courtroom. That is not to say that some circumstance might not change this dynamic; however, the judge’s power to influence the courtroom’s emotional tone on entering should not be underestimated. As a consequence, the more well-prepared a judge feels, and the more confidence that he or she will be well supported by staff inside the courtroom, the more likely the judge’s entrance will be calm, self-assured, and friendly. A judge who can enter the courtroom in a relaxed manner, greet the staff while also acknowledging the presence of the audience, take sufficient time to get seated and comfortably organized at the bench, and appear genuinely friendly and in charge contributes greatly to the general calm and “comfortableness” of a courtroom.

Immediately on taking the bench, a judge may want to briefly greet the audience in the courtroom as well by saying “Good morning” or “Good afternoon.” A judge may wish to follow by introducing himself or herself and setting out what will be going on in the courtroom that day.

I explain when I first come out that everyone will get a chance to talk to me. When people are well mannered, direct, and polite, I am sure to thank them for such behavior so that the crowd can hear.

—Judge

If the litigants are primarily self-represented, many judges find that scripts explaining how the court works are useful. In some cases, local or state statute may require some scripts, such as at the beginning of traffic arraignment calendars. While this sort of information can be provided in writing or by video, personal communication from a judge is often far more effective for self-represented litigants. If a video or written document is used, the judge may want to provide a brief introduction so that litigants will pay more attention to the information. Scripts should be as brief as possible, describe how the courtroom will work, and set forth what is expected of the litigants. The script’s purpose is to familiarize litigants with the courtroom process and formal legal tenets so that the calendar can run smoothly, and the parties can proceed with less anxiety.<sup>77</sup>

If interpreters are not available at the time that the judge reviews the script, the judge may want to review some of the key points before a hearing with a non-English-speaking litigant if an interpreter is available at that time. The judge may also want to develop a handout with highlights of the speech in English and other languages frequently spoken in the community that the clerk can hand out at check-in.

IV. Roll Calls

It is usually ineffective to simply call cases up for hearing in the order they appear on the calendar. The judge should obtain the information needed to categorize the cases, to identify and dispose of the matters that need to be referred elsewhere, to allow counsel—especially pro bono attorneys—with other obligations to attend to them, and to identify the matters that can be resolved quickly. Failure to obtain this information can easily lead to frustrating delays for litigants who are not in serious disagreement or result in stressful time pressures for the judges at the end of the calendars when faced with heavily contested matters yet to be heard.

Beginning the calendar with a simple roll call can help organize the cases effectively. It gives everyone in the courtroom time to settle down and become somewhat accustomed to the surroundings. The judge can start by explaining that he or she is simply going to go down the list of cases that are set for hearing that morning (or afternoon) to see who is present and get an idea of how best to organize the day. The judge should explain (1) that the order of cases will not necessarily determine which case will be heard first, (2) why there are calendars with different times (many courts create differentiated calendars by labeling one as 9:00 and another as 9:01), and (3) that cases on the later calendar may be called before cases on the earlier calendar.

The litigants might be asked to stand when they hear their case called and to make their presence known to the judge. The judge would acknowledge them as they are called and let them know that they need not come forward but that their case will be handled later, after the roll call is completed. Given the complexities of pronunciation, judges should not feel awkward about apologizing for mispronunciation or other challenges in calling the cases. Sometimes it is even difficult to know the gender of the litigants. A gracious apology goes a long way in case of error. At the end of the roll call, the judge may want to ask anyone present whose name hasn't been called to either identify themselves or check-in with the clerk to determine if the litigant is in the wrong courtroom, if there is a difficulty with the schedule, or if the litigant did not recognize when his or her name was called.

---

<sup>77</sup> Sample scripts are included at the end of this chapter.

During the roll call, the judge can also ask whether the litigants have reached any sort of agreements about their cases. Since self-represented litigants usually don't know how to prepare a stipulation, many come to court even if they are in basic agreement.

As the roll call proceeds, cases tend to organize themselves for the calendar into the following groupings:

1. Cases that will not go forward;
2. Referrals to courtroom support staff;
3. Cases ready for quick disposition; and
4. Cases requiring hearings.

The judge can mark his or her own notes during the roll call to keep track of the status of each case as the calendar progresses.

V. Organizing the Cases on a Calendar

Some cases can usually be handled quickly during the roll call.

A. Dropping Cases—No Appearance

Judges should consider allowing a reasonable time (from the time the parties were noticed to appear) before dropping cases from the calendar. If the litigants have been noticed to appear for a clerk's check-in 15 to 30 minutes before the judge begins the roll call, then it may be reasonable to drop cases at the end of the roll call. Otherwise it is best to wait until after some other court business has been conducted, thereby giving the litigants a short window in which to appear. Judges should be as flexible with self-represented litigants as they are with attorneys who are given latitude because they have matters in other courts or courtrooms that keep them from being present at the beginning of a calendar or when their cases are called.

Allowances should be made for the fact that self-represented litigants are generally not regular visitors at the court and often are confused about where to go and how to find the appointed courtroom. Problems with signage and lack of awareness of issues like security lines to which attorneys and court staff have grown accustomed often present time-consuming barriers for litigants as they navigate their way to the appointed courtroom.

I went to the courthouse where I filed my papers, but the judge I was supposed to see wasn't there. They had an information booth, but the person there couldn't tell me where to go. At least he said it might be across the street. Now, I'm really late. I go out of the building, and there are a bunch of buildings "across the street." None of them have signs saying they're a court. One of them said it was a county building, so I went in there and asked. At least the security person could tell me that there were courtrooms on the third floor. I went up to the third floor and read the sign, but I couldn't find the room they were talking about because it was behind another set of doors and there weren't any markings there. By the time I finally got to the courtroom, my heart was pounding and I was totally stressed. I really thought about forgetting the whole thing and just going home.

—Self-represented litigant

B. Moving Party Appears—No Valid Service

If there has been a prehearing readiness assessment, this case may have been handled prior to hearing. If not, the moving party may claim to have left a proof of service at home. If so, and if time and distance permits, then the person might be able to go home and bring the proof back to the court; in these instances the judge should warn the litigant that the case will be dropped at the end of the calendar if he or she has not returned by then. The moving party more likely will assert that they were unable to serve the responding party, and a new court date will be required. The judge can refer the party to supporting staff and volunteer resources for help with understanding service alternatives, or the judge can engage the parties individually, or in a group, in such a discussion.

C. Continuance Required

Continuances might be required for various reasons. In courts where mediation for child custody is mandated, for example, the required mediation may not have been completed prior to hearing. Financial documentation necessary to make guideline child support orders may be missing.

Many judges find it helpful to provide blank forms that litigants may need such as orders after hearing, income and expense declarations, and declaration forms so that the litigant can complete those forms and be heard later in the calendar. Others have handouts on how to accomplish service or the next steps in the type of proceeding being heard so that the litigants have the information necessary to make the next hearing more productive.

VI. Referrals to Court and Volunteer Support Staff

Some courts are fortunate enough to have a range of referral resources available to which self-represented litigants may be sent. Such resources are very helpful, however, when they are not available the judge may, as discussed below, be able to find alternative ways of resolving the issues that have led to the need for referral.

When a judge can and does make a referral, unless the person to whom the referral is made is present in the courtroom, the judge should make use of a referral slip detailing the reason for the referral. This is of enormous help to the person to whom the referral is made because the self-represented litigant can completely misunderstand or fail to be able to articulate the reason for the referral.

A. Courtroom Self-Help Attorneys

Using court-based self-help attorneys throughout the court process—and in all types of cases (not just IV-D child support matters)—has proven to be an optimal approach for California trial courts. Use of these attorneys to help manage court calendars has proven helpful in the following ways:

1. Stipulations and Agreements. If litigants indicate at roll call that they have an agreement, the self-help attorneys can assist them in writing that agreement into an appropriate form for the judge to sign.

2. Procedural Information. Helping litigants with procedural questions enables the judge to avoid spending the time to answer such questions. It can also correct paperwork problems promptly and eliminate needless continuances. If a continuance is necessary, the self-help attorney should notify the court clerk so the matter can be timely called. The litigants can be told what they must do before the next court date, and then they can leave.
3. Settlement Assistance. Without attorneys in the mix, self-represented cases often have no help to resolve a case. After all, if self-represented litigants could resolve their disagreements amicably, they would not be in court. Using court-based self-help or volunteer attorneys in the courtroom gives the self-represented litigants a chance to settle their issues on the day of their hearing. In some instances, litigants may be able to settle all issues in their case and leave the courthouse with a judgment. If, after meeting with the attorney, the parties are not in agreement, the issues can be narrowed and the parties informed about what the judge will need to hear in order to make a decision in the case. Significant numbers of litigants need issues honed and documents organized and exchanged so that hearings can proceed in an orderly and efficient manner. This reduces frustration for everyone and actually allows more matters to be heard. In many cases with both parties representing themselves, a simple investigation reveals that there is no real dispute—they just don't know what they are supposed to do, or need someone to run a computer software support guideline before agreeing to an order.
4. Preparation of Written Orders and Judgments. Litigants need help with preparing written orders after the hearing and judgments. Most self-represented litigants have great difficulty in drafting clear and enforceable orders after the hearing. Qualified assistance at this stage not only enhances the court experience for them but also reduces the frustration to litigants and the courts of later attempts to enforce unclear or ambiguous court orders, resulting in a significant reduction of court time at later hearings.

5. Explanation of Orders. Self-help attorneys in the courtroom can also explain the legal terms used in the court's orders. When the court attorney is bilingual, he or she can explain legal terms to the litigant and answer the litigant's questions in a way that can't be done by the interpreter, who is ethically bound to interpret only what is said in the proceedings.

B. Child Custody Mediators

Particularly when mediation is mandatory, having mediators in the courtroom for those individuals who have not been seen in mediation prior to the hearing date can be critical to avoid a continuance. This is especially true for matters that have been set with an order shortening time on a temporary restraining order.

C. Volunteers

It is extremely valuable to develop a volunteer pool that reflects the diversity of language and culture of the community.

1. Attorneys. They can assist with the same sorts of matters as the court-based self-help attorneys; however, careful training must be available to volunteers on how to deliver services without the appearance of bias.
2. Community-Based Social Services. These can also be resources in a courtroom setting so long as volunteers are trained on impartiality and in the specific services to be rendered to the litigants.

Many of the cases that a judge would refer to courtroom support staff will be cases that would otherwise have to be continued if staff were not available to help. Even with the help of support staff, some of the cases will have to be continued. When it is clear that a case must be continued, the best practice is to call the case as soon as possible and assign a new date rather than make the litigants wait through the calendar only to be told their case will not be heard.

When these referral resources are not available, it may be possible for the judge to refer to a legal aid program, to a bar referral program, to a law school clinic, or an unbundled service program.

Some of the tasks may be appropriate for assistance from a trained clerk. To assist with others, the judge or the court may find it useful to generate special forms, instructional materials, checklists or software (and the judge may be able either to hand out those materials or tell the litigant to obtain them from the clerk's office. In yet other situations, the judge may have to give a general set of oral instructions that will make it easier for the litigant to take care of the task on their own. As always such instructions can be structured as sufficiently general that they will not be perceived as non-neutral.<sup>78</sup>

VII. Cases Requiring Hearings

Once the cases that cannot proceed have been handled, and others referred to available courtroom support staff, the judge can begin the hearings.

A. Default Hearings

It can make sense to put default cases early in the calendar, provided the designated time for latecomers to arrive has passed. Default cases tend to move fairly quickly. Further, the litigants tend to be less anxious, since they are unopposed. By handling default matters first, the rest of the people in the courtroom are allowed to observe the judge and the courtroom staff to see how the process works and to become somewhat familiar with it. It also avoids making the default litigants wait through long, contested hearings for their own very short ones.

It is important to allow parties a reasonable time to appear for hearings (e.g., 20 to 30 minutes from the time that the parties were noticed to appear). Therefore, if roll call and triage of cases are completed before that time, it might be best to call one or two of the contested matters first. Choosing a case or cases that appear to have low levels of animosity and few issues to handle, and that will move quickly, seems wise. The judge can then turn to the default matters when a reasonable time for the respondents to appear has passed.

---

<sup>78</sup> Indeed, if the judge, early in the proceedings indicates that he or she may at a later point have to give such instructions, any risk of erroneous perceptions of non-neutrality will be further reduced.

B. Organizing Contested Hearings

If there are cases with attorneys representing the parties, they may benefit from some further efforts to settle their issues. Be sure they report back to the judge in time for a hearing prior to the end of the calendar. There may be cases previously referred to courtroom support staffs for assistance that now need a hearing. The remaining cases would be ready for a contested hearing.

There are various ways to organize contested hearings. The following are some of the possibilities:

1. Less Serious Charges. In handling traffic and misdemeanor arraignment calendars, judges have found it useful to call the least serious cases first. Defendants will often accept prosecution offers or indicated sentences in these cases, and it helps get a good percentage of the cases heard in a relatively short amount of time. Also, if the most serious cases are called first, defendants' decisions not to resolve their cases and ask for the appointment of the public defender to represent them might set an example for defendants in less serious cases to pass up settlement opportunities that might be in their best interests.
2. Least Time First. Take the cases that seem likely to take the least amount of time first so that the litigants can leave. Of course, it is difficult to predict the amount of time the hearing will actually take. Taking estimates from lawyers is realistic; asking self-represented litigants for their estimates is generally not helpful.
3. Judge's Knowledge of the Case. Based on a judge's prior experience with a particular case or with similar types of cases, certain cases may be expected to be more or less contentious during a hearing. If so, some judges choose to start with the less contentious cases to set the tone for the hearings and to get short matters resolved first. However, there may be a case on the calendar in which the parties previously created a commotion in the courtroom; the judge may want to handle this case first to remove these "difficult" litigants from the courtroom.
4. Timekeeping. A judge might identify the number of cases likely to need hearings, figure out the amount of time left on the calendar, calculate an average available time per hearing, inform the audience of the average time, and keep to the time allotted for each hearing. Additional time could be offered at the end of the calendar if the judge's time estimate is off because more cases have settled, leaving additional time available for hearings.

5. Clustering Issues. Some judges cluster their cases, putting those with similar issues together based on their prior reading of the file. This allows them to focus on the specific legal issues to be considered. They may put the attorney cases first to allow the self-represented litigants the opportunity to hear and learn from the presentation.
6. Team Judging. In some courts, two or three departments have "teamed up" for a self-represented day calendar. Cases are assigned according to a direct calendaring system, but if one department finds that a particularly high number of litigants require contested hearings, the "team" department will be called on to take the overflow. The idea is that both departments are unlikely to overflow on the same day.

VIII. Dealing with General Hearing Issues

A. Avoiding Dropping Issues

In self-represented litigant cases, there is no attorney to make sure that issues are not dropped and that the court handles everything. A particularly busy docket, with cases involving multiple issues, makes it easy to overlook an issue in a given case. Not only might this have a serious impact on the litigant, but when issues are overlooked, litigants will simply refile another set of papers to get another hearing, thereby causing themselves and the court an additional appearance. Keeping a checklist of issues on the cover of the case file helps avoid this problem.

It can also be valuable to raise issues that the litigants have not identified—for example, a litigant may file for a change of custody, not realizing that the divorce is not final. Alerting litigants to the need to take additional steps and referring them to the self-help center can help avoid major problems.

B. Getting Needed Information

Getting sufficient information on which to make an informed decision is central to any hearing. Information can come from a number of sources.

Self-represented calendars require assignment of judges with significant levels of subject matter expertise in the area of law involved. If litigants have not been to a self-help center to assist them with their pleadings, their declarations may contain confusing, superfluous, or contradictory information. It is unlikely that the judge will have the benefit of written points and authorities or trial briefs. Furthermore, litigants will not be able to reference relevant points of law during hearings to which a judge can refer. If judges are going to get the information they need to make knowledgeable decisions, they will often have to ask the parties questions. Therefore judges must know the questions they need to ask and how the law applies to the answers they receive.

A more complete set of suggestions for judge-litigant interactions appears below.

1. Documents, Photographs, or Other Physical Evidence. At the beginning of the calendar, litigants should be advised as part of the introductory script that any documents or other evidence received by the court must be shown to the other party first. The judge should also explain the process for marking exhibits and for referring to them. Litigants typically will be unable to lay the foundation for admitting documents, photographs, or physical evidence. If the other side does not object, the court faces no problem in admitting the evidence; the judge retains the discretion to discount or disregard it as required by law. If the opposing party objects, the judge should question the proponent of the exhibit to bring forth the foundational information on which the judge can then rule on admissibility. See chapter 4 for a fuller discussion of these issues.
2. Investigator Reports. The less time available for meaningful hearings, the more judges are forced to rely on information gathered outside the court setting. Information from court investigators, for example, can be both helpful and problematic for judges in self-represented cases. The litigants will not be able to test the reliability of this information by examining the investigator during the hearing. This creates a far greater potential for inaccuracy in the data than in cases where attorneys are able to review these reports with clients and identify any inaccuracies. To minimize the potential for error, litigants should be provided with copies of investigators' reports in advance of the hearing and be given sufficient time to identify and respond to any erroneous material that they find. And judges should be willing to hear complaints from self-represented litigants about inaccuracies in investigative data. See chapter 9 for a fuller discussion of these issues.

3. Expert Reports. Judges may also be getting information from experts such as forensic psychologists, vocational counselors, or accountants. In cases involving self-represented litigants, psychological experts may be more common. This sort of information can present more pitfalls for a judge than investigative information because it includes the expert's opinions. Self-represented litigants have no idea how to inquire into the credentials of experts or the quality of their opinions. It is a problem when a psychologist's report, for example, is written using arcane psychological terms. If psychological testing has been included, the problem is aggravated. Professionals in the field of psychology are not in agreement about the use of testing or the role it should play in the law. Attorneys and judges are outside their own field of expertise when it comes to evaluating experts' reports, and self-represented litigants are at a total loss.

Questions are not asked about whether doctorates were obtained at accredited schools, whether tests have been validated for the purpose being used, whether experts are qualified to administer the tests given, whether test administration was proper, what the most current literature says, what limits there may be to this person's expertise in psychology, and so forth. In reality, the more factual data that a judge can glean from an expert's report, the more helpful it will be. Once again, ensuring that the self-represented litigant obtains a copy of the report well in advance of the hearing appears to be the only available, even though minimal, safeguard.

4. Information From Court Staff or Court Files. Judges may also be getting information from various court staff members. One example would be the procedural information provided by staff doing readiness reviews of the cases prior to the calendar. Other examples might include the following:
  - a. Criminal histories on domestic violence calendars;
  - b. Identification of other cases involving the same parties;
  - c. Restraining orders in other cases involving the same parties;
  - d. Child custody orders from other cases involving the same parties;
  - e. Findings and orders from other cases;
  - f. Compliance reports from court-ordered services (e.g., drug testing); and
  - g. Child custody recommendations.

Whenever a judge obtains information outside the courtroom, it is critical that the litigants not only be made aware of the information that the judge has but also have an opportunity to respond to it. The potential for error, particularly when dealing with cases involving common surnames, can be great, and input from the litigants is essential to avoid mistakes. When judges receive information from staff working inside the courtroom, the information should be received either in writing with copies provided to both parties and to the judge, or the judge should state on the record in the presence of both parties the nature of the information received and request confirmation from the litigants of its accuracy.

5. Avoiding Ex Parte Communications With Staff. It is never permissible to have discussions with staff about information that bears on pending decisions in private out of the presence of the parties. Allowing self-help attorneys, volunteers, child custody mediators, or others in the courtroom who may be working directly with litigants to have access to the judge privately outside the presence of the parties conveys an appearance of "backdoor justice" that not only may constitute actual impermissible ex parte communication but definitely undermines the procedural justice goals for the court. If a situation does arise, such as when safety is an issue, when a judge does receive information from courtroom staff outside the presence of the parties, this should be fully disclosed to the parties at the earliest possible opportunity at the start of the hearing, and the parties should be given an opportunity to respond.

6. Avoiding Overly Friendly Conduct Toward the Attorney If One Party Is Represented. Many attorneys appear often before court staff and judges and may know them well. These attorneys may walk around the courtroom freely and joke with clerks in a way that a self-represented litigant or an outsider would never be allowed to. The self-represented litigant may perceive this as favoritism or may think that the judge will be prejudiced in favor of the attorney.

C. Answering Litigants' Questions

The ability to provide clear explanations to litigants during the hearing is a significant asset to a judge during a self-represented litigant calendar. While judges cannot answer questions about litigants' tactical or strategic issues, they can and should answer questions about procedure or definition of legal terms. If self-help attorneys are present in the courtroom or available at a court self-help center, referral to such resources can provide the judge with a way to help self-represented litigants without taking the time to answer their questions.

The major issue with questions tends to be the amount of time required to answer them rather than the nature of the questions themselves. If a judge can refer the litigants to self-help attorney staff to answer questions, hearing time is maximized. When the judge makes the order in a case, it is best to be clear that the parties actually understand the order. Clearly explaining the terms of the order is well worth the time. Explaining the reasoning may also be helpful. Even when litigants don't agree with the outcome, they are more likely to comply if they understand that the decision was not arbitrary.

D. Identifying Elevated Anxiety Levels of Litigants

It may be difficult for judges and court staff, who are very familiar with the courtroom setting and court procedures, to appreciate the anxiety that many litigants experience in a courtroom. The setting is designed to be formal and austere, to reinforce the court's authority. The language and procedures are totally foreign to any other setting in which litigants typically find themselves. Many court matters are of significant consequence to the participants, with the potential to change the course of their lives. For litigants, not knowing exactly what to expect, trying to keep in mind the key points to bring to the judge's attention, trying to anticipate the tactics and statements of the opposing party, and having fears about the outcome of the hearing contribute to potentially very high states of anxiety. Even lawyers have been known to forget basic facts because of high stress levels, so imagine how much worse it is for a self-represented litigant appearing in court for the first time on a matter of key importance to his or her life.

You do get cold feet when you get there [court]. It's like what do I do? What do I do?

—Self-represented litigant

This is particularly true for immigrants and litigants with limited English proficiency, who not only may not understand English but may not understand the U.S. legal system or how it operates. They may be concerned about being deported or arrested.

I don't ever want to go back to court. That was the scariest thing that I have ever experienced.

—Self-represented litigant after uncontested default divorce hearing

It is possible that a litigant may become too anxious to participate reasonably in the hearing. If so, a recess should be taken to allow the person a chance to calm down before further action is taken. Providing the litigant with an opportunity to go out of the courtroom, have a glass of water, or otherwise "take a break" can provide the time needed for him or her to regain composure. The judge might suggest that the litigant come back into the courtroom to observe other hearings before recommencing his or her hearing. Courtroom support staff, if available, might also be helpful in calming a frightened litigant.

E. Ruling From the Bench

Generally, decisions should be made from the bench whenever possible. Taking routine matters under submission will seriously increase the burden on the judicial officer.

When explaining a decision from the bench, the judge can use the full range of his or her communication skills, including intonation, body language, and eye contact to convey sincerity. The judge can summarize the arguments of the parties so that they are aware that their viewpoints have been heard and considered. Sending a written order after the fact reduces significantly the judge's ability to convey a sense of fairness; individual words in a written order or opinion can easily be taken out of context to create unnecessary hard feelings.

Furthermore, requiring the parties to wait for their order eliminates the opportunity for them to ask the judge for clarification. When litigants understand the orders that the court makes, they are more likely to comply with them.

Exceptions occur when a judge needs to research an area of the law before rendering a decision or when rendering a decision in the courtroom would clearly increase the serious emotional distress of a litigant. The latter situations should be rare. In most cases, an immediate ruling benefits the emotional state of the parties, eliminating continuing anxiety about the outcome.

Matters taken under submission should be decided promptly, and the parties notified of the judge's decision by mail.

F. Providing Written Orders

Lack of written orders creates time loss and frustration for litigants, judges, and law enforcement. If possible, the litigants should leave the courtroom with written copies of the court's orders. Leaving the task of preparing written orders to the self-represented litigants is not realistic in most cases. Unless there are self-help center attorneys or other qualified staff available to assist in preparing orders, the chances are that no orders will be prepared, that the submitted orders will be incomplete, or that the judge will have to completely rewrite the orders submitted—at a time when the matter is no longer fresh in his or her mind.

If staff are to prepare orders, it is most effective to have them present in the courtroom to hear the decision as it is announced, but litigants can also be referred to a self-help center to have an order after hearing prepared (or explained). If this is the case, a referral slip with detailed order after hearing information and a copy of the minute order will help the self-help center staff. It should be noted that minute orders need to be more detailed and comprehensive for self-represented litigant cases. The frequent lack of formal orders after hearings makes detailed minute orders critical to the court's ability to track its own past actions in these cases without requiring a transcript of the record.

IX. Contested Hearings Involving Two Self-Represented Litigants

Judges have found the following suggestions helpful in handling contested matters involving two self-represented litigants.

I explain the process of the hearing and reassure the parties that each will be heard. And I make sure that happens! It usually takes less time to get the information I need because I ask the questions and hear it directly from the parties. The credibility is easier to evaluate from the parties' testimony and demeanor.

—Judge

1. Setting the Procedural Ground Rules. The judge should explain to the parties how the hearing or trial will proceed.
2. Providing Materials for the Parties. The court should provide copies of a six-month calendar at each place at counsel table to which each party may refer. In addition, the court should provide pencil and paper for making notes, recording the judge's decision, and recording the date and time of a future hearing (unless the courtroom clerk prepares that notice).

3. Outlining the Legal Issues the Judge Must Determine. Many judges find it helpful to explain, in lay language, what he or she must decide during the hearing. For instance, in a motion for a change in the amount of child support, the issues are whether there has been a material change in the incomes of the parties or in the time the child spends with each parent, and, if so, whether a change in the amount of support is warranted. The judge should note which party has the burden of proving these legal elements.

If the calendar consists of a series of similar hearings, this explanation need not be repeated for each hearing. The judge can merely ask the parties if they understand, based on the previous hearings, what the judge must decide.

If self-help centers and the judges communicate about procedures and the types of facts that judges will take into consideration, handouts can be created and litigants will have been told or informed of many of these things at different times, in different settings, and by different methods. This will reinforce the information and help create consistency so that litigants will know what to expect.

4. Summarizing the Pleadings. The judge can save considerable time by demonstrating his or her familiarity with the basic written contentions of the parties. The judge can take this summary from the cover sheet prepared by staff, augmented by the judge's own notes made during the file review. This summary also demonstrates to the parties the judge's concern about the case.
5. Swearing the Parties. The judge must remember to have the parties sworn prior to taking their testimony. This can be a time to remind them to stick to the facts relevant to the issues previously outlined by the judge.
6. Hearing the Parties' Stories in a Structured Fashion. The judge should make it clear from the beginning who will go first, and that each side will have the same opportunity to talk. The judge should ask the moving party to present his or her evidence for the first issue the court must decide. If, for example, that issue is whether the court has jurisdiction over the matter, it should be simple to resolve. If the moving party falters in presenting evidence, the judge can ask questions to elicit the needed information (i.e., “How long have you lived in this county?”). The judge can then ask the opposing party if he or she disagrees. The judge can then announce his or her decision on the first issue (i.e., “I find that the court has jurisdiction over this matter.”).

The judge should then proceed to the second issue, asking for evidence from the moving party, asking questions if necessary to elicit the needed information, giving the opposing party an opportunity to contest the information, and ruling on the issue.

7. Controlling the Courtroom. The judge can promptly redirect a party who begins testifying on irrelevant information. The judge should also be quick to silence any interruptions by either party, reminding them that each side will have an opportunity to ask questions or present opposing testimony in turn. As judges well know, the temptation to interrupt during hearings is not exclusive to self-represented litigants.
8. Announcing the Ruling and Preparing a Written Order or Judgment. The general principles on ruling from the bench and having the court prepare the written order or judgment apply.

X. Contested Hearings Involving One Represented Litigant and One Self-Represented Litigant

Many judges report that they dread these hearings because they perceive that they have less flexibility and feel that they must require the self-represented litigant to perform to the level of the lawyer. Other judges report a contrary experience—that lawyers now have sufficient experience with these types of proceedings to realize their common interest with the judge in ensuring that the matter is resolved on its merits.

The most important principles are the following:

1. To give the lawyer an opportunity to present his or her client's case and to advocate for his or her interests; but
2. To proceed in such a manner that the self-represented litigant is able to participate fully in the hearing; and
3. To prevent the lawyer from stymieing the self-represented litigant in presenting relevant, material, and admissible testimony and other evidence.

Judges have found the following procedures useful in these cases.

A. Proceeding As If the Case Involved Two Self-Represented Litigants

The judge should explain the ground rules, outline the legal issues to be resolved, and summarize the pleadings just as if the case did not involve a lawyer. The judge may also want to point out that neutrality may require questions of both parties if matters are not clear, and that such questioning should not be interpreted as providing assistance to one side or the other.

B. Asking the Self-Represented Litigant to Present His or Her Case in a Structured Fashion

The judge should proceed as if both parties were self-represented.

If the lawyer poses objections to the self-represented litigant's testimony or exhibits, the judge can respond in one of the following ways:

1. Asking the Lawyer to Explain the Basis of the Objection in Sufficient Detail Understandable to a Layperson. The self-represented litigant can usually remedy a defective question or provide a sufficient foundation for an exhibit, if an adequate foundation exists, if the process is explained.
2. Asking the Lawyer If His or Her Client Objects to the Admissibility of the Information or Exhibit or Merely to the Form of the Question or the Manner of Its Introduction. If the objection is to form only, the court can note the objection on the record and proceed to allow the information or exhibit into evidence.

3. The Judge Posing the Question. The judge can cut through legal entanglements by posing a question in legally proper form.
4. If the Lawyer's Behavior Is Seriously Delaying the Matter or Preventing the Presentation of Material, Relevant, and Admissible Evidence. The judge can explain the availability of interim orders pending a continuance (which might make the continuance unnecessary or unpalatable). The judge may potentially make a fee order providing that the represented party pay the costs of the other party to allow him or her to consult with or hire an attorney because of the opposing attorney's conduct. The judge may also indicate that no fee awards will be made in favor of the represented party if the case is continued because of the conduct of the attorney, and ask that the lawyer confer with his or her client to determine how to proceed.
5. If the Lawyer Objects to the Procedure. The judge can explain the neutral purposes of the proceeding and allow the attorney to put the objection on the record. If the attorney continues to object, the judge can "note your continuing objection to my method of proceeding. Your rights are protected."

C. Controlling the Courtroom

The judge should maintain the same tight control over the courtroom as if two self-represented litigants were present, not allowing either the self-represented litigant or the lawyer to interrupt each other. This is important not only to ensure a correct decision on the merits in the case, but also to reassure those litigants waiting to be heard on other cases that the court takes their rights seriously, wants to hear their story, and will not allow the other side to derail this important process.

D. Announcing the Ruling and Preparing a Written Order or Judgment

The general principles on ruling from the bench apply. However, the judge can ask the lawyer to prepare a written order or judgment embodying the court's ruling and submit it to the self-represented litigant for review. The judge can explain to the litigant that he or she should review the draft order for accuracy. If the court is structured to prepare those orders in the courtroom, the judge should proceed to generate the order or judgment as if the case involved two self-represented litigants, particularly if the lawyer's client did not prevail in the matter.

XI. Scripts and Helpful Phrases for Developing Courtroom Styles

The following materials are provided as examples of approaches judges can take in introducing parts of the hearing process to self-represented litigants. Every judge will need to adapt them to the type of case, the circumstances of a case, and to the judge's own personal style.

While it can be useful to have specific wording, remember that how information is conveyed is as important as what is said. It is usually better to avoid reading a script; rather, the judge should be familiar enough with the message that he or she can look at the litigants while saying it. The bored airline flight attendant giving the standard preflight information about exits and seat belts and no smoking is not the model. Racing through the script is also more frustrating for listeners for whom this is new information, which they do not want to miss. Many judges use their voice to emphasize the meaning of the message and to monitor the reactions of the participants: Are they paying attention? Are they getting it? Do they have questions? It is often helpful to build in opportunities for participants to ask questions.

A. Sample Preliminary Instructions

"The procedures we follow in court are used to make sure that each side gets a fair opportunity to be heard. I will give each side the chance to tell its story. I might ask for more information or details, and I might check to make sure I understand what is being said. Some of the things that seem important to you might not be part of what I can consider in making my decision. I may interrupt either side if I don't understand the point being made, if I have heard enough on the point, or if you are going into an area that I cannot consider in making my decision. Sometimes I might explain what you need to show me about certain kinds of evidence so that I can consider it and decide how important it is. The other side may object to some of the things you say or offer as evidence. I am bound by the legal rules of evidence and will follow them in ruling on such objections and in deciding what evidence to consider in making my decisions in the case. In order to make the process work as well as possible, I might find it necessary to stop the hearing and recommend that one or both of the parties consult with other resources such as the self-help center or a lawyer."

"First I will listen to what the petitioner wants me to know about this case, and then I will listen to what the respondent wants me to know. I will try to give each side enough time and opportunity to tell me their side of the case, but I must proceed in the order I indicated. Please do not interrupt while the other party is presenting his or her evidence. Everything that is said in court is written down by the court reporter, and in order to ensure that the court record is accurate, only one person can talk at a time. Wait until the person asking a question finishes before answering, and the person asking the question should wait until the person answering the question finishes before asking the next question."

B. Sample Basic Rules for Evidence Presentation

"Evidence can be in the form of testimony from the parties, testimony from witnesses, or exhibits. Everyone who testifies will be placed under oath and will be subject to questioning by the other party. All exhibits must first be given an exhibit number by the court clerk and then must be briefly described by the witness who is testifying and who can identify the exhibit. The exhibit is then given to the other party who can look at the exhibit and let me know any reason why I should not consider that exhibit when I decide the case. I will then let you know whether the exhibit can be used as evidence."

"I have to make my decision based on the evidence that is admissible under the rules of evidence. If either party starts to present evidence that is not admissible, I may stop you and tell you that I cannot consider that type of evidence. Some examples of inadmissible evidence are hearsay and irrelevant evidence. Hearsay is a statement by a person who is not in court as a witness: hearsay could be an oral statement that was overheard or a written statement such as a letter or an affidavit. If a party doesn't object to it, I can consider hearsay evidence. Irrelevant evidence is testimony or exhibits that do not help me understand or decide issues that are involved in this case. Sometimes you may want to tell me information that you think is important, but that is not legally relevant. If you do, I will stop you, because I am not allowed to consider legally irrelevant evidence."

C. Sample List of Elements to Be Proved

The statement of the list of elements should be short and clear with no explanation of legal nuances. Where possible, it is helpful to explain what evidence can prove the listed elements.

"A motion to modify child support must establish a change in the financial situation of one of the parents or a change in the time that each parent is responsible for the children. Evidence would include a pay stub, tax return, and so forth."

"Petitioner is requesting an order for protection. An order for protection will be issued if the petitioner can show that she is the victim of domestic abuse. Domestic abuse means that she has been subject to physical harm or that she was reasonably in fear of physical harm as a result of the conduct or statements of the respondent."

"Petitioner is requesting a harassment restraining order. A harassment restraining order will be issued if the petitioner can show that she is the victim of harassment. Harassment means that she has been subject to repeated, intrusive, or unwanted acts, words, or gestures by the respondent that are intended to adversely affect her safety, security, or privacy."

D. Sample Questions to Elicit Critical Information

In cases with common elements, asking the questions necessary for the legal determination allows judges to get the facts they need and allows time at the end for any other information that the litigant wants to provide. Often, the opportunity to answer the critical questions is enough for the litigant.

"Give me a few minutes to get some basic information that I have to have in these types of cases, which will give us more time for you to spend on necessary details."

For a security deposit case:

1. Did you have a written contract?
2. Was a 30-day notice sent?
3. Was the plaintiff on the contract?
4. Is the defendant the owner?
5. How much was the rent?
6. How much was the deposit?
7. Was the key returned?
8. Was an inspection notice requested? Was it completed?
9. Was the 21-day letter delivered or mailed?
10. Was any amount of the security deposit returned?

For a hearing on spousal support:

1. How are current monthly living expenses paid?
2. How were monthly living expenses paid when you lived together?
3. Were there any other sources of income or assets for monthly living expenses?
4. Did both of you review and sign federal tax returns?
5. What documents or records did you use to determine your income on the Income and Expense Declaration?

"I have read the papers asking for the restraining order. Mr. Respondent, is there anything you disagree with in the declaration asking for the restraining order?" Often, the respondent will agree or only disagree about things that are not legally relevant. "Thank you, Mr. Respondent. But what you've told me indicates that there is indeed a basis for a restraining order, and I will go ahead and grant it."

E. Sample Questions to Establish the Foundational Requirements for Documents and Photographs

"What is this? Why do you think this is helpful to me in deciding the case? How was it obtained? Does it accurately portray what it's supposed to show? When was the photograph taken?"

F. Sample Questions to Establish the Admissibility of Hearsay

“When was this said? What were the circumstances when it was said? Why do you think this would be helpful to me in deciding the case? Why do you think I should take it seriously?”

G. Sample Approach to Swearing Both Parties

This approach removes the need for distinctions between arguments and testimony:

“You must remember that you are under oath throughout the hearing (or trial). Anything you say—as a statement, question, or argument—must be truthful.”

H. Sample Setting of Ground Rules When One Party Is Represented

“Mr./Ms. Attorney, I intend to use relaxed language and relaxed rules of procedure today to ensure that Mr./Ms. Self-Represented Litigant understands what is happening and to ensure that he or she is able to participate effectively. I ask you to do the same—to avoid the use of legal jargon and to explain the points you wish to make in language that both I and Mr./Ms. Self-Represented Litigant can understand.”

I. Sample Response to a Resistant Attorney

“If we proceed under formal rules of evidence, you (the attorney) will be required to explain to the self-represented litigant the basis for any objections you make—with enough detail that the self-represented litigant can take the corrective steps necessary to proceed. For instance, if you object to a leading question, you would need to explain that objection sufficiently so the self-represented party will be able to pose an appropriate nonleading question.”

“I overrule the objection on the grounds that Mr./Ms. Self-Represented Litigant is proceeding in substantial, if not exact, compliance with the rules of evidence. Counsel, I invite you to make a continuing objection that can be noted on the record so that we do not have to interrupt

Mr./Ms. Self-Represented Litigant’s presentation for this same sort of objection.”

“Counsel, does your client contend that this document is either inadmissible or something other than what it purports to be?”

J. Some Generally Helpful Phrases

1. “I understand and appreciate . . .”;
2. “Please talk directly to me, not to _____”;
3. “Stay with the facts of the case—rulings are based on the law—not on personal issues”;
4. “Anger is not persuasive”; and
5. “Raising your voice is not helpful.”

It may not be necessary to stop an interrupter verbally; merely raising your hand as a “stop sign” may suffice. Use of the gavel is appropriate if the interrupting behavior persists.

K. Some Sample Nonconfrontational Questions

1. “Give me a little more information about”
_____
2. “Help me understand” _____
3. “Tell me more about” _____
4. “Give me some specific details about”
_____
5. “Give me a word picture—kind of like a slow-motion instant replay” _____

L. Some Ways to Control the Interrupter

1. “I know that it is difficult to wait your turn. I assure you that I will see that you are allowed your turn as well.”
2. “When you speak, I will be sure that you are not interrupted either.”

3. "Remember that one of the ground rules that I talked about at the beginning is that we don't let people interrupt each other."
4. "I'm going to call for a recess [or continuance] in this case."
5. Holding up your hand.

M. Ways to Recognize and Validate the Litigant

1. "I can tell that you really care about your children."
2. "It sounds like you really tried to . . ."
3. "I'm really impressed that you've been able to work out so many issues today."

Conclusion

This chapter has described some of the techniques that judges use to handle cases with self-represented litigants that meet the needs of both the courts and litigants. This is an area where judges have tremendous flexibility in developing a personal style that allows them to communicate their genuine concern to the litigant while allowing all persons in court to be heard.

Chapter 7: Settling Cases

Introduction	7-1
I. Benefits to Providing Settlement Assistance	7-2
II. Settlement Assistance Options	7-3
A. Which Process to Offer?	7-4
B. Should Participation in the Settlement Process be Voluntary or Mandatory?	7-7
C. Which Cases Are Appropriate for Referral to a Settlement Process?	7-9
D. How and When Should Cases be Referred to a Settlement Process?	7-10
E. Who Should Conduct the Settlement Process?	7-11
F. Location: The Courthouse is Often Best	7-15
G. Confidentiality and Other Things to Consider	7-16
H. Judicial Review of Settlement Agreements	7-16
III. Providing Information to Litigants to Encourage and Support Participation in Settlement Processes	7-18
A. The Information Challenges Facing Self-Represented Litigants	7-18
B. Information About Settlement Assistance Options	7-19
C. Helping Litigants Prepare to Participate in Settlement Processes	7-21
IV. Examples of Settlement Assistance Programs for Different Case Types	7-23
A. Family Law	7-23

B.	Landlord/Tenant	7-24
C.	Small Claims	7-25
V.	Providing Information to Judges and Court Staff	7-25
A.	Intracourt Communication	7-25
B.	Community Resources Lists	7-26
C.	Evaluation of Programs	7-26
	Conclusion	7-26

7

Settling Cases

Introduction

Self-represented litigants frequently welcome assistance in settling their disputes before the hearing or trial. Without representation by counsel or assistance from the court, litigants usually do not have a realistic opportunity for meaningful settlement discussions prior to their scheduled court date. However, when presented with an offer to engage in mediation or settlement negotiations, many accept assistance gratefully and are able to resolve their disputes with the help of a neutral third party.

There are, however, some special challenges in settlement efforts in cases involving self-represented litigants. Most important among these is that these litigants may not come into the settlement process with enough information about their legal rights and the potential outcome of their dispute in court to meaningfully negotiate with the other side and make reasoned decisions about whether and on what terms to settle. These litigants may also be particularly vulnerable to pressure to settle, which could leave them feeling that they were denied their “day in court,” and feeling dissatisfied with the court system as a whole. In designing settlement strategies to assist self-represented litigants, judges and court staff should therefore think carefully about how to address these challenges.

This chapter describes some of the common settlement assistance processes and their benefits and challenges for self-represented litigants and offers suggestions for how courts and judges can facilitate and encourage settlement discussions in ways that support self-represented litigants. In many states, different statutes and rules of court regulate different types of processes and case types. While recognizing those differences, this chapter focuses on common issues in cases with self-represented litigants.

I. Benefits to Providing Settlement Assistance

Both litigants and the court can benefit from providing settlement assistance to self-represented litigants before hearings and trials on their cases. For litigants, the potential benefits include:

1. Less Formal and Complex Procedures. The procedural and evidentiary rules that apply at trial either do not apply or are relaxed in settlement processes, which typically make these processes easier for self-represented litigants to understand and navigate.
2. More Time to Explain the Situation. Settlement processes may allow litigants more time and opportunity to explain their situation in full context than they might have in the courtroom. This additional time and attention can be critical to enhancing self-represented litigants sense of procedural justice.
3. Ability to Address Broader Range of Issues. Settlement processes, particularly mediation, may also allow the litigants to address issues, such as emotional issues, that would not be considered at trial. By addressing all of the parties' interests, a more comprehensive resolution of the dispute is possible.
4. Ability to Agree to Creative Solutions. In settlement processes, particularly mediation, litigants can create solutions to their disputes that could not be ordered by a court and that can often better address all of their interests. When the parties agree on their own resolution, they may be more likely to comply with its terms than if a decision is imposed on them.
5. Possible Benefits Even Without Settlement. Participation in settlement discussions may have benefits even when the discussion does not resolve the case. The process may resolve some issues or help the parties focus on the facts and issues in dispute. Such processes may also allow litigants to rehearse their presentations and to reduce their anxiety in presenting their case to the court.<sup>79</sup>

---

<sup>79</sup> One judicial officer has observed that even where mediation has not resulted in a resolution and trial has been held, the litigants better understood the process and

For the courts, potential benefits of offering settlement assistance:

1. More Satisfied Litigants. A survey of litigants and their attorneys indicated that they were more satisfied with the services provided by the court when they had access to mediation through the court.<sup>80</sup>
2. More Judicial Time. To the extent that settlement assistance saves time, that frees us judicial time for the cases that need greater attention.<sup>81</sup>
3. Reduced Time to Disposition. This same study found that court-connected mediation programs can reduce the time to disposition, which can help courts meet their goals for disposing of cases in a timely manner.<sup>82</sup>

II. Settlement Assistance Options

Settlement assistance services for self-represented litigants can take a wide variety of forms. The court can offer different settlement process, from mediation to arbitration. The processes might be conducted by judges, temporary judges, attorneys, or court-employed mediators or community mediators. These services can be provided at the time of a hearing, trial, or other court-scheduled event. The settlement processes can take place in the community or at the courthouse.

This section discusses some of the pros and cons of different options a court might want to consider when designing a settlement assistance program that will be serving self-represented litigants more readily accepted the outcome. William O. Scott, Jr., Court Commissioner, Butte County Superior Court, letter to Judy Garlow, Director, Legal Services Trust Fund, State Bar of California, Aug. 31, 2005.

---

<sup>80</sup> Evaluation of the Early Mediation Pilot Programs, Administrative Office of the Courts, 2005, pages xx-xxi and 53-64. This report is available at www.courtinfo.ca.gov/reference/documents/empprept.pdf

<sup>81</sup> A study of mediation programs in California trial courts found that these programs can reduce the number of trials and hearings held by the court. Id. at pages xx-xxii, 41-43, and 70-76.

<sup>82</sup> Id. at pages xx and 44-52.

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Italic

A. Which Process to Offer?

There is a broad range of different alternative dispute resolution (ADR) processes.<sup>83</sup> Three of the processes most commonly used in litigated cases are mediation, settlement conferences, and court-connected arbitration.

1. Mediation

In mediation, a neutral third person facilitates communication between the disputants and helps them try to reach a mutually acceptable resolution. The process is informal, and the neutral's role generally consists of helping the parties communicate with each other, clarifying disputes, and, if possible, reaching a resolution. The mediator does not impose or compel a settlement or a particular result; the disputants themselves decide whether to resolve their dispute and on what terms. As discussed below, there are also special, stricter confidentiality requirements that typically apply in mediation and are intended to encourage open and honest communication in this process.

Because mediation is the least formal and most flexible of the frequently used ADR process, it may be the most appropriate for self-represented litigants who are struggling with the formal procedural requirements of the litigation process. It is important to note, however, that mediators may use a variety of different techniques, or "styles," of mediation to encourage settlement. One of the most common ways that mediator styles are classified is as facilitative or evaluative.<sup>84</sup>

i. Facilitative Mediation. In facilitative mediation, the mediator focuses primarily on helping the parties' negotiate. At the extreme, facilitative mediation may consist of simply helping the parties to communicate with and understand each other. The potential benefits of facilitative mediation with self-represented litigants include:

- It allows litigants a greater opportunity to express their concerns, including concerns about issues, such as emotions,

---

<sup>83</sup> For more comprehensive information about these and other ADR processes, see the CJER Bench Handbook, Judges Guide to ADR.

<sup>84</sup> See generally, Leonard L. Riskin, Understanding Mediators' Orientations, Strategies, and Techniques: A Grid for the Perplexed, (1996)-1, HARV. NEGOT. L. REV. 7 (1996).

Formatted: Small caps

that would not be considered in a process focused on purely legal issues;

- It allows litigants to craft a resolution that addresses all their concerns; this, in turn, may improve satisfaction with the mediation and court processes;
- It may improve communication and help parties who will have an ongoing relationship avoid or resolve future disputes.

The potential challenges with purely facilitative mediation include:

- Litigants who are not aware of their legal rights or norms for resolving similar disputes may be disadvantaged in negotiating an agreement; and
- Some parties may be less likely to reach agreement without a third person's assessing the dispute or "pushing" the parties to reach settlement.

ii. Evaluative Mediation. In evaluative mediation, the mediator focuses primarily on assessing the issues that may be important to the dispute, which, in a litigation context, typically includes the likely outcome of such a dispute in court. At the extreme, evaluative mediation may include actions intended to direct the outcomes of the mediation in a manner that the mediator considers appropriate.

The potential benefits of evaluative mediation with self-represented litigants include:

- An assessment from a neutral person who is aware of the law and norms for resolving similar disputes may help the parties have a more realistic sense of the likely outcome in court, which may encourage settlement;
- The mediation outcome is more likely to reflect legal rights or norms for resolving similar disputes;
- Some parties may be more likely to settle if the neutral "pushes" them.

The potential challenges with purely evaluative mediation include:

- Litigants may not have the opportunity to express or address non-legal concerns which may be fueling the litigation;
- Some litigants may feel coerced by “pushing” from mediators; and
- To properly provide an evaluation, mediators must have expertise in the subject matter of the dispute.

While many mediators might be classified as predominantly facilitative or evaluative, most use a combination of these techniques that they think will help in the particular dispute. If your court wants mediators in its program to use, or refrain from using, a particular style or technique it is therefore important to communicate this to the mediators. It is also important to inform parties about mediation styles so that they will have appropriate expectations about the mediation process. In addition, if the parties will be selecting the mediator, this information is important to help them select someone who will use techniques that best meet their expectations and needs.

2. Settlement Conferences<sup>85</sup>

In settlement conferences, the parties meet with a neutral third person to explore settlement options. The neutrals are often judges or experienced attorneys serving as a temporary judge. Settlement conference procedures vary from neutral to neutral and from dispute to dispute, but are generally informal. Neutrals often use techniques similar to those used in mediation; however, in a settlement conference, the neutral generally focuses more on purely legal issues and takes a considerably more active role in trying to guide the parties to a resolution that the neutral believes is appropriate. Typically, the neutral evaluates the case based on knowledge of the law and prior experience and then seeks to persuade the parties to change positions and move toward a compromise settlement. As in mediation, the neutral does not render a decision; the ultimate decision about whether and how to resolve the dispute is left to the parties.

3. Court-Connected Arbitration

---

<sup>85</sup> These may also be referred to as status conferences in some areas.

In arbitration, a neutral person hears arguments and evidence from each side and then decides the outcome of the dispute. Thus, unlike in either mediation or settlement conferences, in arbitration the neutral is a decision-maker. This makes arbitration more like the regular trial process than either mediation or a settlement conference. However, arbitration is still less formal than a trial, and the rules of evidence are often relaxed. In addition, in court-annexed arbitration programs, the arbitrator's award is non-binding; the parties do not have to accept the arbitrator's decision, they can ask for a "trial de novo."

B. Should Participation in the Settlement Process be Voluntary or Mandatory?

Whether participation in a settlement process is voluntary or mandatory will typically depend on the laws or court rules that authorize the particular program.

1. Mediation. For the most part, mediation involving self-represented litigants will be voluntary. There are certain exceptions to voluntary mediation. In some states there is mandatory mediation of all child custody and visitation disputes<sup>86</sup>. Some courts may also have established mandatory mediation programs by local court rule.
2. Settlement Conferences. These might be either mandatory as part of a caseload management system or voluntary.
3. Court-connected Arbitration. Court-connected arbitration is usually part of a mandatory court program.

The potential benefits of voluntary participation with self-represented litigants include:

- Litigants may be more likely to settle their cases if participation in a settlement process is voluntary; and
- Obtaining the parties' voluntary agreement will help ensure that they appreciate and participate meaningfully in the process.

The potential disadvantage of voluntary participation is that fewer cases typically end up participating in the settlement process if litigants have to agree to participate in the process, so fewer cases are resolved through this process or otherwise benefit from it.

---

<sup>86</sup> E.g., California (Family Code 3170)

The potential benefits of mandatory participation in a settlement process include:

- More cases typically end up participating in the settlement process;
- Participating in a settlement process is often beneficial when appropriately ordered without the parties' agreement.

The potential disadvantages of mandatory participation include:

- Litigants may feel coerced into participating in the process and therefore may not meaningfully participate; and
- A smaller proportion of the participating cases may settle when participation is mandated.

Some courts have combined mandatory and voluntary elements in their programs. For example, the court may mandate that parties discuss settlement process options with the court's ADR administrator but allow the parties to voluntarily choose whether to participate in a settlement process after this discussion.

Particularly if participation in a settlement process is mandatory, it is important that the court help the litigants understand that this process is not an obstacle to keep them from their day in court but an opportunity to participate directly in the resolution of their dispute. In the case of both voluntary or mandatory programs, as discussed below, it is very important to provide litigants with information about the settlement assistance available through the court. If participation in the court's settlement process is voluntary, self-represented litigants are not likely to volunteer to participate without this information. If participation is mandatory, litigants are likely to be upset about being referred to the settlement process if they have not received information about this process.

C. Which Cases Are Appropriate for Referral to a Settlement Process?

Not every case is suitable for referral to alternative dispute resolution. While the self-represented can reap particular benefits from the assistance of a neutral, the risks of harm are also maximized when a litigant is inappropriately referred to a settlement process, since that litigant has no attorney to protect him or her. Among the areas in which particular caution should be used in referring any, but particularly self-represented, parties are the following:

1. When a litigant lacks mental capacity – Such litigants should not be referred to a settlement process where they are required to participate on their own. Any agreements into which they enter may be inequitable, impracticable, or unenforceable.
2. If a case presents an apparent potential for violence, or a substantial disparity in power – Particular caution must be taken if using mediation or settlement discussions in these cases. If such a case is referred to a settlement process, the court should be particularly careful to ensure that the neutral conducting the process has the appropriate training to handle this type of case. Screening procedures and safety precautions should be used, including requiring the mediator to conduct an assessment of violence to determine how best to protect the victim and address the power imbalance. It is also important to make clear that the issue of violence itself cannot be mediated.

Before making referrals, judges or others making these referrals should consider also any financial burdens on the self-represented, and any other potential consequences, such as an enhanced risk of violence in the family.

D. How and When Should Cases Be Referred to a Settlement Process?

If participation in a settlement process will be mandatory, the court will need to decide how and when cases should be referred to that process. In courts where participation in these processes is voluntary, the court will still need to determine how and when to provide litigants with information about the settlement processes available to them through the court.

In most courts, the determination of whether to refer a case to a mandatory settlement process is made by the judge based on information provided by the litigants.<sup>87</sup> The judge can use this information to assess whether referral to a particular settlement process is likely to be helpful. However, where participation is mandated in certain case types, referral may be automatic or may be done by court staff.

Because the costs of litigation, both financial and emotional, typically mount over time, it may be most helpful if litigants use settlement processes early in the life of a case. However, some litigants may not be ready or have enough information to settle their disputes at that point and settlement processes can be helpful at almost any point before trial. It may therefore be ideal to refer cases to settlement processes or provide information about settlement assistance opportunities at several points during the litigation process. Referrals can be made or information provided:

- At the time a case is filed;
- At the first case management or other conference at which a judicial officer reviews the case;
- At another court hearing;
- Shortly before trial; or
- On the day of the scheduled trial.

For example, many courts offer mediation early in the life of a case and also offer settlement conferences close to the time of trial.

As noted above, when litigants are referred a settlement process, it is important that the court help the litigants understand that settlement process, particularly if participation is mandatory. A very important part of this is helping litigants understand that they are not required to settle their dispute in this process. As noted above, self-represented litigants may be particularly vulnerable to inappropriate pressure to settle, so judges or others making referrals should make clear that in mediation or a settlement conference, the litigants decide whether and

---

<sup>87</sup> For example, in California, litigants in general civil cases are required to provide the court with a case management statement that includes information about the case and the parties' interest in participating in various settlement processes (CRC 3.)

on what terms to settle and in court-annexed arbitration, the litigants decide whether to accept the arbitrator's decision.

E. Who Should Conduct the Settlement Process?

As noted at the beginning of this section, settlement processes can be conducted by variety of different people including:

- Judges – judges often conduct settlement conferences;
- Court staff – many child custody and visitation mediations are conducted by court staff mediators who have extensive experience and training;
- Attorneys serving as temporary judges – courts often use staff or volunteer attorneys serving as temporary judges to conduct settlement conferences;
- Neutrals on a panel established by the court;
- Neutrals on a panel established by another organization – some courts contract with local bar associations or community dispute resolution programs to provide mediators; or
- Private neutrals selected by the litigants – some courts leave it up to the litigants to select their own private neutral.

There are pros and cons to each of these approaches:

- Judges – using judges as neutrals requires more judicial time, but litigants may appreciate judicial attention and feel more satisfied with their court experience;
- Court staff – it may cost the court more to use staff as neutrals and there are likely to be fewer neutrals to select from; however, this approach gives the court a high degree of control over the quality of the neutrals, including over their skills with self-represented litigants;
- Court panel – having a court panel will provide a greater variety of neutrals that litigants can select from and the court can still exercise control over the quality of the neutrals by establishing

- qualification requirements. These requirements can include training focused on handling cases involving self-represented litigants;
- Non-court panel – this approach typically gives the court less ability to control the quality of the neutrals; the court has to rely on the expertise of the entity that created and maintains the panel;
  - Private neutrals – the court does not have to expend resources on neutrals under this approach, but the court also has no ability to control the quality of the neutrals.

If a court is going to hire staff neutrals or maintain a panel of neutrals, it is important for the court to consider what characteristics or skills they want the individuals who will serve as neutrals to have and what practices they want the neutrals to engage in or not engage in. Recently a survey of attorneys was conducted to see what factors attorneys looked for in mediators.<sup>88</sup> These factors are likely also applicable to self-represented litigants and should be borne in mind by judges as they themselves promote settlement, evaluate potential neutrals, or make referrals.

1. Avoiding Pressure to Settle

A neutral should not measure his or her success in terms of the numbers of agreements reached. A basic goal of mediation and settlement assistance is to settle cases, but that is not its only purpose. No one, including judges, should put pressure on the mediator or settlement assistance provider or on the litigants to settle cases. Rather, the goal should be to improve litigants' abilities to make decisions about their disputes and to move their cases toward productive and timely final resolution. Both litigants and the court can benefit from partial settlement, bifurcation of issues for a more focused trial, or scheduling of pretrial status review conferences.

It should be remembered that inappropriate pressure could be far more harmful when a party is self-represented.

2. Integrity

---

<sup>88</sup> J. Kichaven, "What Attorneys Want in Mediators and How to Provide It," LOS-L.A. ANGELES DAILY JOURNAL, (AAug. 14, 2006.)

Formatted: Font: Not Italic

Formatted: Small caps

Participants place a high value on honesty in the mediator and settlement assistance provider when assessing the fairness of the process. The ability of a settlement officer or mediator to keep a promised confidence or to make a report faithfully contributes enormously to the trustworthiness of the process. Studies on procedural justice report that when litigants have confidence in the judge's integrity, they are likely to regard the court process as fair regardless of the outcome.<sup>89</sup> Results suggest that this may hold true for other neutrals in settlement processes. It is important not to let pressure to settle interfere with this integrity.<sup>90</sup>

3. Knowing the Underlying Legal Subject Matter

Attorneys generally expect that the mediator or settlement assistance provider must be able to participate in an intelligent and informed conversation about the merits of the case. In designing a program for self-represented litigants, courts should be aware that litigants believe that settlements must at least come close to meeting some standard of fairness and therefore that they must be based in the law as well as underlying equity. When a self-represented litigant has not been given needed legal information prior to mediation or settlement, the mediator or settlement assistance provider will have to be ready to provide legal education and information.

4. Avoiding Manipulation or Oversimplification

Discussions aimed at settlement should be forthright and should honestly discuss the issues in the case.

Weaknesses and strengths should not be over- or underemphasized.

Judges, staff, and neutrals should be careful not to confuse problems with language, lack of literacy, or low educational level with a litigant's underlying intellectual ability. They should remember that self-represented litigants can generally grasp legal concepts, at least when they are properly explained, and apply them to their own matters. They are frequently accustomed to dealing with similarly complex

<sup>89</sup> T. Tyler, What Is Procedural Justice? Criteria Used by Citizens to Assess the Fairness of Legal Procedures, ~~(1988)~~ 22 LAW & SOC'Y REV. 103 (1988).

<sup>90</sup> By way of example California Rule of Court 5.120(h) sets out California's professional ethical standards for court-connected child custody mediators.

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Small caps

issues in other areas of their lives and are unlikely to respond well to intimidation, manipulation, or trickery.

5. Ability to Communicate

The ability to communicate clearly is perhaps the most important characteristic of an effective neutral.

Judges should remember that the most effective neutrals, particularly effective mediators, have the ability to share knowledge, to promote settlement, to reframe old issues, and to introduce new possibilities for consideration, and to do so with sincerity and honesty.

6. Being Prepared

The neutral should read the file or other paperwork to become familiar with the issues at hand. Being informed, prepared, and willing to get to the issues in a businesslike manner demonstrates respect for the litigants.

7. Developing Case-Specific Approaches

To be effective, neutrals must develop case-specific approaches to work with the parties. One standard format or approach will not work with every type of case, or every litigant. For example, in mediation, with some litigants it will work best to meet together; for others it will be best to caucus; a combination might be most effective for others. Each case will have its own specific needs that the neutral must analyze and understand.

8. Developing a Plan for Follow-up

Follow-up can be critical to reap the benefits of settlement assistance or to make sure that these benefits do not dissipate.

1. If the litigants reach agreement in a mediation or settlement conference, it is good practice for the neutral to follow-up to make sure that the agreement is memorialized in writing. A neutral may be able to assist the litigants by writing down the settlement terms the parties have agreed to or, at the request of the parties, assisting in resolving dispute over whether a written agreement accurately reflects the settlement terms. Some programs are structured so that the parties' agreement is entered with the court as an order or stipulated judgment.

2. If the litigants do not reach agreement in a mediation or settlement conference, there may be a need for an additional meeting or meetings; perhaps the litigants need to get more information or documentation, to talk to affected or respected parties, or just to take the time for reflection. Whatever the case, it is good practice for the neutral to reach agreement with the litigants on a plan for the next step and a schedule set so that everyone knows what is expected.

F. Location: The Courthouse Is Often Best

Generally, in most cases, the best place to work with self-represented litigants will be at the courthouse, at the time of some other court-scheduled event, as this is often the best time to get both parties together. The courthouse is also seen as fully neutral, safe, and accessible to communities in the area. In addition, performing the mediation at the courthouse makes it easier to take advantage of court-located services such as security (to keep the parties apart when needed), informational resources, and possible help in putting any agreement in writing and getting it properly filed with the court.

Unfortunately, many courthouses currently do not have adequate space to conduct mediation and other settlement services. While at least one state's Trial Court Facilities Design Standards<sup>91</sup> call for space for such services as part of any future courthouse facilities planning, in the meantime, the court can explore conducting settlement processes at other locations in the community, such as at community dispute resolution centers or at the offices of the neutrals.

G. Confidentiality and Other Things to Consider

---

<sup>91</sup> Judicial Council of California, California Trial Court Facilities Standards (adopted April 21, 2006); section 7.5

Other things that a court should consider in structuring a settlement assistance program include the confidentiality of the process and the availability of interpreter services.

It is important when establishing a settlement program and informing litigants about that program, that courts be clear about the confidentiality of the particular process. Litigants' perceptions of the courts can be negatively affected if information that they think is confidential is subsequently revealed.

In general, state laws provide that offers of compromise, whether made in a settlement process or other context, are inadmissible to prove liability for the claim.<sup>92</sup>

In addition to these general confidentiality provisions, there are often specific provisions concerning the confidentiality of certain settlement processes.

It is important that courts that establish mediation programs structure their programs with these statutory limits in mind. In particular, it is important that judges not expect or request that litigants or mediators inform the court about what happened in the mediation.

Another important issue that courts should consider in structuring a settlement program is providing interpreter services. It is key that an interpreter is available if a litigant in a settlement process is non-English speaking or limited-English speaking. It is one thing to be able to speak English in everyday life and another to be able to proceed effectively in a court case.

H. Judicial Review of Settlement Agreements

This is an area in which settlement programs may vary depending on the type of case being handled. In some types of cases, such as those involving child custody and visitation or the compromise of a minor's claim, the judge must approve any settlement reached, whether with represented or self-represented litigants. In other types of cases, such as general civil cases, judges typically do not review, and may often not even see, settlement agreements; the parties simply dismiss the pending civil case when they have agreed to a settlement.

---

<sup>92</sup> The federal rule is Fed. R. Evid. 408.

In those types of cases in which judicial review is required, the judge's role generally includes ensuring the legal sufficiency and basic fairness of any agreement reached in a settlement process. The purpose of the judge's review is not to "second guess" the wisdom of the litigants' agreement or to restrict in any way the wider array of solutions available to them by way of settlement. Rather, it is to minimize the opportunity for inadvertent procedural omissions or mistakes and to reduce the risk of oppressive, fraudulent, or unconscionable advantage being taken by one side over the other based on lack of representation or other potential threat such as in cases of domestic violence. In these cases, the judge is the final protection to ensure the fairness of the agreement for the self-represented litigant. This is true regardless of whether the judge actually hears the case, or whether he or she takes responsibility by signing the agreement formally entered into by the parties.

When conducting any review of a settlement agreement, judges should keep in mind the applicable confidentiality laws. For example, judges should keep in mind that, except in child custody and visitation mediations, neutrals are generally not competent to testify about what happened in the settlement proceedings and judges should therefore not request or permit parties to request such testimony. Judges should also not ask parties to reveal communications that took place in such mediations.

1. Courtroom Review of Settlement Agreements

When agreements are reached through a settlement process that occurs in a judge's courtroom, the litigants may be available for voir dire and review if the judge so desires. The judge can easily review the agreement and examine the litigants if there is a question as to the legality of the agreement, or whether one or the other of the parties has entered into the agreement knowingly and understands the agreement and any rights that party may be waiving.

2. Review of Agreements Entered Outside the Courtroom

When an agreement between self-represented litigants is crafted outside the courtroom and submitted to the judge in writing without the parties available for voir dire, the situation changes. Then the judge must decide to what degree he or she will scrutinize the agreement between the litigants, and whether to sign a stipulation which includes terms that are clearly egregiously unfair to one side or the other. For example, a properly notarized marital settlement agreement between two self-represented litigants arrives along with a judgment in a judge's chambers for signature. The parties have awarded the vast majority of the community assets to the husband and mutually waived spousal support; however, the case file reveals a history of domestic violence against the wife. Many judges might find this set of facts disturbing enough to prevent them from signing the judgment. If so, the judge might elect to notice the parties in to voir dire them on the record or to send them to the self-help center, if available, for assistance and referral to some community-based assistance. If the court has a specialized domestic violence calendar with community support available, the voir dire hearing can be set on that day.

Note that in those cases in which the judge will not be reviewing the parties' settlement agreement, it becomes doubly important that the court provide self-represented litigants with information and assistance to effectively participate in the settlement process, as discussed below.

III. Providing Information to Litigants to Encourage and Support Participation in Settlement Processes

A. The Information Challenges Facing Self-Represented Litigants

As noted at the beginning of this chapter, just as they do in the regular litigation process, self-represented litigants face certain challenges in settlement processes.

1. Self-represented litigants often lack an understanding of their legal rights and obligations as well as of legal procedures. They often find it difficult to articulate their positions and may not be able to recognize settlement terms that inadequately protect their rights and interests. Thus these litigants will need legal education to participate in settlement processes. Those working with self-represented litigants to provide this education should have a high level of professional legal expertise in the subject matter.
2. Self-represented litigants may not be able to negotiate settlement terms that adequately protect their rights and interests. Often the parties may have significantly varying levels of power within a case. Neutrals must know how to handle this discrepancy in power during the settlement process.

3. While the concepts of mediation and settlement are not difficult if explained, the role of the neutral and the process of achieving settlement in court cases are not always obvious. It is important that self-represented litigants be informed about the role of the neutral as separate from the judge. The neutral is not the decision-maker. The litigants have the right to disagree and to know that not settling their case is not a sign of disrespect to the court.
4. Because they have little basis for comparison, self-represented litigants often have unrealistic expectations of both the litigation and the settlement process. They may therefore ask for levels of service from neutrals that cross the line to representation. They may expect, for example, that the neutral will advise them which option to choose, which would impermissibly cross the line over into legal advice.

B. Information About Settlement Assistance Options

To encourage and support self-represented litigants in participating in settlement assistance processes, it is important that they be provided with information about the settlement processes that are available through the court and in the local community. This includes information about:

- The basic nature of the settlement process(es), including the roles and responsibilities of the neutral and the parties, how the process typically proceeds and the confidentiality of the process;
- The fact that parties are not required to settle their cases in these processes; and
- If the parties are responsible for selecting the neutral, information about how to do this.

This information can be provided in a variety of forms, including:

- Brochures or other written materials;
- Videos that demonstrate various settlement processes;
- Web-based information, which can include both written materials and video vignettes;
- Oral explanations of these processes, either in a group setting or individual basis.

As discussed above, information about settlement assistance available through the court should be provided to litigants as early in the litigation process as possible and throughout the life of a case, whenever participation in a settlement process can be ordered by the court or voluntarily agreed to by the parties,

1. Clerk's Window. Litigants can be provided with information at the time papers are filed, or information can be included with papers as they are served.
2. ADR Administrator or Other ADR staff.
3. Self-Help Center. If the court has a self-help center, information about mediation and settlement assistance and procedures might be obtained there. Many self-help centers also provide mediation and settlement services or help prepare litigants to participate in mediations or settlement conferences.
4. The Courtroom. Information about settlement assistance options can be provided by judges directly from the bench. However, as noted above, it is important to be sure that the litigants are clear about what is happening, understand the process, and understand that they are free not to settle. Self-represented litigants may be particularly vulnerable to pressure to settle, especially when it comes from an authority figure such as the judge. It is critical that litigants not perceive this process as a way to deprive them of their "day in court."

C. Helping Litigants Prepare to Participate in Settlement Processes

As noted above, self-represented litigants may need assistance to participate effectively in settlement processes, although probably less than they would need to effectively participate in a trial. To effectively negotiate, they may need help understanding the laws that apply in their case and the potential outcomes if their case goes to trial and how to present these in a settlement process. If the court is going to provide settlement assistance services to self-represented litigants, it is very important that the court build a system for providing this assistance into its settlement program.

As with information about settlement processes, this assistance can be provided in a variety of forms, including:

- Pamphlets or other written materials that provide basic explanations about the law in particular areas, such as evictions or debt collection;
- Web-based information, which can include pamphlets or frequently asked questions. State access to justice resources have a great deal of this type of information to assist self-represented litigants;
- Oral presentations concerning the law and procedures, in group or individual settings; and
- Individualized assistance in how to present a litigant's position in a particular case.

The same types of resources identified in Chapter 5, that may be available to assist self-represented litigants to prepare for and participate in the litigation process may also be appropriate resources for self-represented litigants preparing to participate in a settlement process. Available resources may include:

- Court self-help centers;
- Volunteer attorney programs;
- Legal services programs;
- Law school clinics; and
- Local bar association programs.

Some courts, particularly those that do not have self-help centers, may also want to look to the neutral to provide self-represented litigants with needed legal information. This approach is used for court-connected custody and visitation mediation and many family law settlement assistance programs. This usually includes an orientation regarding the law and providing information to the litigants about their situation if appropriate as the mediation progresses.

The benefit to this approach is that the self-represented litigant can more effectively participate in the settlement process by knowing about reasonable outcomes and can get needed services in one step, making the whole process easier on the litigant and potentially preventing an unfair result. However, this approach may be less desirable than providing a separate source of legal information and assistance to self-represented litigants.

Relying on neutrals to provide legal information may raise competency and role-confusion concerns, particularly in the mediation context. While it is generally permissible for mediators to provide information that they are qualified by training or license to provide, not all mediators are attorneys. Non-attorney mediators may not be qualified to provide the type of legal information that would prepare a self-represented litigant to negotiate. A court might try to address this issue by using only attorney neutrals, but attorney neutrals are often concerned that, if they provide legal information, it increases the likelihood that self-represented litigants will become confused about the neutral's proper role and think that the neutral is representing them. Thus, if they are required to be the source of legal information, some attorney neutrals will be reluctant or unwilling to handle cases involving self-represented litigants. Judges can try to mitigate these concerns by explaining the role of the neutral to self-represented litigants and emphasizing that the neutral will not be advising or representing any party. This may not allay all of the neutrals' concerns, however, and judges will most likely need to weigh the potential benefits of having legal information provided by the neutral with the difficulty that placing this responsibility on neutrals may create in recruiting and retaining neutrals.

IV. Examples of Settlement Assistance Programs for Different Case Types

Optimum settlement processes and procedures may vary with the type of case. The following are examples of settlement assistance programs set up by some courts for particular types of cases.

A. Family Law

1. Courtroom Settlement Assistance for Family Law Motions. Many judges have found that having court-based self-help attorneys or volunteer attorneys present in their courtrooms to assist self-represented litigants with settling their motions is routinely effective in reaching agreements.

Typically, issues to be resolved include matters related to children, spousal support, temporary use of property, and debt payment. Clustering cases with self-represented litigants onto specialized calendars generally allows the judge to make the most efficient use of the attorneys' time. If the litigants come to an agreement, the attorney writes the agreement into the form of a stipulated order for signature by the judge. If an agreement cannot be reached, the attorney helps the parties identify areas of agreement and narrows the issues to be presented to the judge for hearing. Once the hearing has been completed, the attorney can prepare the court's written order after the hearing.

2. Courtroom Comprehensive Settlement Assistance. Some judges have expanded the scope of their courtroom settlement services. Judges refer litigants to work with the attorneys toward settlement of all issues in the case. If complete settlement is not possible, the case is moved as far along the process toward judgment as is realistic for that day, and follow-up scheduling is established. Orders will be made on all issues before the court that day, and all other issues the parties can agree on.
3. Settlement Conferences. Several courts have implemented settlement conference services for self-represented litigants as part of a caseflow management process in family law. Litigants are given notice of a settlement conference date at some point in the process. Some courts notice litigants of that date at the time the initial papers are filed, some when responsive papers are filed, and some when cases are set for trial. The time from initial filing to the time for the settlement or status conference also can vary. Qualified family law attorneys, either from the courts' self-help center or volunteer attorneys from the local bar, conduct settlement discussions. The discussions address all issues in a case. If agreements are reached, judgments can be entered the day of the conference. If not, further settlement meetings can be scheduled or trial dates set. If trial dates are set, the attorney can help the parties organize documents, prepare joint trial statements, and assist them in preparing to present their issues to the judge.

4. Settlement Conference Calendars. Where both parties have made appearances in the case, litigants are noticed to appear before court for a settlement conference. The judge conducts the settlement conference. If settlement is not reached, the case is scheduled for further conferencing or set for trial.

B. Landlord/Tenant

One court has developed a two-tiered model that clearly recognizes the need for self-represented litigants to be prepared to participate in the settlement process.

1. Preparation. Attorneys from the court self-help center offer twice-weekly workshops for self-represented tenants and on-call services for self-represented landlords to educate them about the settlement process, potential options, jury instructions, and the need to go to trial if no agreement is reached. Stipulation for judgment forms and jury instructions are discussed. This is a stand-alone workshop. Follow-up assistance is provided if litigants do not settle their cases and must proceed to trial.
2. Settlement Conference. Attorneys conduct the settlement discussions between the self-represented litigants. These are not the same attorneys who provide the preparation assistance. In this model, attorneys who conduct the settlement conferences are from local legal services programs. Agreements can be beneficial to both sides of eviction litigation. For example, a landlord may get a date certain for restoration of the premises and a payment plan for back rent; and the tenant may get some additional time to find new housing. The parties may even be able to agree to lodge the stipulation with the court so that the case can be dismissed if the premises are vacated in good shape as promised, relieving the tenant of an eviction record.

C. Small Claims

Mediation and settlement discussion for self-represented litigants can be productive in small claims matters, particularly in light of the difficulties related to collection of judgments.

1. Court-Based Mediation. Some courts operate in-court mediation programs for small claims court matters. The judge can refer litigants to the mediator at the time of the hearing. If no agreement is reached, either a further mediation session can be scheduled or the hearing can be held. Mediators from community mediation programs, court self-help attorneys, volunteer attorneys, or local legal services most frequently conduct court-based mediation.
2. Community-Based Mediation. Frequently, judges refer small claims litigants to mediation at community-based dispute resolution programs. When this occurs, new court dates should be scheduled fairly promptly in case no agreement is reached. The judge should make it clear that there is no pressure for the parties to agree. Mediation should not be perceived as an obstacle to their right to a hearing.

V. Providing Information to Judges and Court Staff

A. Intracourt Communication

Whatever settlement process the court chooses to provide, it is important that each part of the court know what the others are doing. For example, judges need to know what settlement services are available at the self-help center, what cases are being handled, and at what times. A self-help center needs to know if judges are expecting staff to be providing same-day settlement services to litigants so that planning to provide such on-demand services can be made. Clerks need to know what specific types of settlement services are offered at the courthouse, at what point in the court process they occur, what preparation might be required, and what assistance is available.

B. Community Resources Lists

The court should maintain a complete and updated list of community resources available to self-represented litigants for settlement services. This list should include information on contacts, areas of expertise, language in which services are offered, any special cultural competencies, eligibility requirements, and cost of services, if any. The court may be able to obtain much of this information from the coordinator of the county's dispute resolution programs act (DRPA) coordinator.

C. Evaluation of Programs

In order to ensure that settlement services meet the goals set out this section, it is often helpful to provide for an evaluation of the services. This can include interviewing or surveying litigants to get feedback about their experience.

Conclusion

Settlement assistance processes have become a key part of the options that courts use to help resolve cases. These processes can be particularly helpful in self-represented litigant cases, because they are typically simpler, less formal, and easier for self-represented litigants to understand and navigate.

However, courts need to be aware of the challenges self-represented litigants face when the courts are designing and implementing their settlement programs. It is critical for courts to keep in mind that self-represented litigants may not come into the settlement process with enough information about their legal rights and the potential outcome of their dispute in court to meaningfully negotiate with the other side and make reasoned decisions about whether and on what terms to settle. These litigants may also be particularly vulnerable to pressure to settle, which could leave them feeling that they were denied their "day in court," and feeling dissatisfied with the court system as a whole. Courts should structure their settlement programs so that self-represented litigants are provided with necessary information about both the settlement process and about their legal rights so that they can effectively participate in settlement processes. Judges, court staff, and neutrals should also avoid placing pressure on litigants to settle cases.

Chapter 8: Special Due Process Considerations

Introduction	8-1
I. Problems With Self-Represented Litigants Getting and Giving Notice	8-1
II. Problems With Ex Parte Communications to the Court	8-2
III. Problems With Information in Internal Court Systems	8-3
IV. Procedures to Minimize Risks of Due Process Violations	8-4
Conclusion	8-6

8

Special Due Process Considerations

Introduction

All people are guaranteed due process of law under both the United States and State Constitutions.

One of the paramount due process values is notice—notice of charges or claims, notice of proceedings, notice of filings, and notice of information that the court will consider in acting on a case—and the opportunity to act on this notice.

Court procedures have been carefully established to guarantee that parties to court proceedings receive from the court and from other litigants the notice to which they are entitled and also that they are given the time to act on this notice, as appropriate.

This chapter explores the interplay between these and other due process rights, and the needs of self-represented litigants.

I. Problems With Self-Represented Litigants Getting and Giving Notice

Special challenges exist in making sure that self-represented litigants both receive the notice to which they are entitled and give the notice to opposing parties to which those parties are entitled. Some of the factors behind these challenges include the following:

1. Self-represented litigants generally do not know the rules about what information can be shared, what must be shared, what must not be shared, and when such sharing must occur;
2. Self-represented litigants are generally more difficult to contact than attorneys by fax or e-mail with reports and other documents that need to be received shortly before a hearing;

3. Professionals assisting the court as mediators, investigators, and researchers are often reluctant to contact a self-represented litigant directly with information that they would provide to an attorney as a matter of course because they are concerned about the potential response of the litigant to that information;
4. Self-represented litigants are unfamiliar with the procedures required to subpoena and cross-examine witnesses, and to explain or refute information in documents of which they have been given notice; and
5. Self-represented litigants often have multiple cases pending before different judges or court divisions and thus might reasonably expect that these courts would be automatically aware of the issues in a litigant's different cases, even when the courts are not so informed. Another type of problem that can occur in multiple case situations is when judges inadvertently rely on information from another court case file without the party's knowledge or opportunity to respond to that information.

II. Problems With Ex Parte Communications to the Court

Ex parte communications can occur inadvertently when judges and other court staff are in close contact and are working hard to process cases efficiently and in the best interest of the litigants. For example:

1. A family court services mediator or probate investigator may speak about his or her interaction with the litigants with the judge in chambers or another location where the parties are not present and are unable to comment.
2. A court-based self-help attorney or paralegal may provide a judge with information about the financial issues with respect to child or spousal support outside the presence of the parties.

3. A clerk in a domestic violence court may provide the criminal court judge with a record of related cases that includes information from a juvenile dependency case. This information is not made available to the litigants because of the confidential nature of the dependency case. There is no chance to object to the information or to respond to it in any way.

Self-represented litigants are less likely to discover that such ex parte communications have occurred, are less likely to know how to challenge them when they have occurred, and are less able to rebut inappropriately communicated information. It is also possible that opposing attorneys and even court staff may be more likely to initiate ex parte communication when they know that the self-represented litigant is not in a position to prevent this from happening.

The responsibility of courts to “self-police” in such situations is therefore particularly high.

III. Problems With Information in Internal Court Systems

Given the increased amount of information available in computer systems and through case managers, judges may be presented with information not developed by the litigants or their attorneys. Moreover, even when litigants are aware of the information and can respond to it, some kinds of information can create substantial risk of undue prejudice and confusion of issues, and can potentially mislead the trier of fact.

1. Criminal history information (rap sheets) obtained by a domestic violence court coordinator. For instance, an authorized Family Court search of criminal history may reveal that a respondent in a domestic violence matter is on probation for possession of a controlled substance. Does this make him or her any more likely to have committed domestic violence in the judge’s mind? How will the court give the parties notice that the information has been received and considered by the judge in a manner that provides a reasonable opportunity to respond to it? Who will have access to this information?

2. Information about cases involving people or incidents that are remote in time, relationship, or nexus to the issue before the court. For instance, a mother has a current dissolution with a contested custody issue. The court's case manager has located a previous paternity case in which this mother had been involved in a custody dispute over two children with another man. In that five-year-old case, there was a child custody evaluation recommending that the children be in the primary custody of their father. Should a judge see and be influenced by the previous evaluation in the older case? If so, how will the parties be notified that this evaluation is being considered? Who should have access to the evaluation? How will the case be set for hearing in a way that allows time for self-represented parties to respond to this information?
3. Information in current cases that may prejudice a judge unfairly on a particular issue in a related but different case. For instance, a woman has filed for dissolution and set a hearing to ask for custody. The judge is aware that she is also the defendant in an eviction case in which the basis for eviction is loud parties in violation of the lease. Should the judge be influenced by this information in making the decision about custody in the current dissolution case? How will the court bring the matter to the attention of the parties?

IV. Procedures to Minimize Risks of Due Process Violations

Since attorneys are not available to raise concerns and objections about due process in all such types of situations, judges should be especially mindful of due process in cases involving self-represented litigants. Litigants—just like attorneys—must be informed of ALL the information that the judge will be using to make a decision and must have sufficient time to review the information to be able to raise concerns about its accuracy and probity and to rebut it.

Many of the institutions designed to provide information to the court are overburdened. Judges need to be aware that there may well be factual errors in reports—or that terms may be used that are imprecise or inappropriate. In addition to time to review the reports, litigants must be given the opportunity to raise questions at the hearing and present evidence to rebut the report.

Judges can also encourage reporting professionals to review their reports with self-represented litigants before submission, thereby providing the opportunity to correct and rebut. In one county, the common practice is for the child custody mediator to review the materials in the custody evaluator's report with the self-represented litigant. The review is intended to ensure that the litigant understands it, that errors are corrected, and that the litigant receives from the mediator perspective on how the information will be considered.

Formal written protocols can help set the boundaries for communications among judges and between judges and court staff on substantive matters (those that go beyond calendaring or other nonsubstantive procedural issues). The following protocols and procedures are helpful:

1. Written policies for communications among judges, between judges and court staff, and between judges and other government workers such as probation officers, social workers, and child support enforcement attorneys and staff, about any substantive matters related to litigants.
2. A standard procedure whereby all communications to judges about substantive matters related to cases must be in writing and be provided in advance to all parties.
3. A standard procedure whereby litigants are given the opportunity to question a person making a report about its content, to question anyone whose hearsay statements or opinions may be contained in the report, and to offer evidence with respect to it. Reports should contain contact information for those whose input has been considered in the report so that the litigants may have the opportunity to bring these individuals to court for questioning.

If the court intends to review any documents not submitted by the parties such as docket sheets or computer printouts about related cases, notice should be given to the parties indicating which specific documents are to be reviewed, and copies of these documents must be available to the parties in a timely fashion so that they have the opportunity to be heard if they object.

Sometimes forms are marked as “confidential,” thereby creating in the litigants an expectation that the information they provide will be kept private. Litigants must always be informed of the limits to this confidentiality. Examples include family court services reports and recommendations as well as probate investigator reports and files.

It is important to inform litigants of their legal rights against self-incrimination. Judges may also want to consider taking precautions against eliciting potentially self-incriminating information, or other information against a litigant’s legal interest, in cases where there are, or are likely to be, criminal charges. Training for court staff is also helpful on issues such as limitations of confidentiality of communications with litigants and on evidentiary privileges relevant to the types of information common to cases involving self-represented litigants (e.g., public information, medical records, mental health information).

Conclusion

To protect due process rights of self-represented litigants, judges and court staff must remain alert to the particular enhanced risks that these litigants face and must implement systematic protections to minimize these risks. They also need to make use of this same sensitivity as they obtain information and act on it in individual cases.

Chapter 9: Communication Tools

Introduction	9-1
I. Communication Challenges With Self-Represented Litigants	9-1
II. Word Content, Formality, and Overall Language Level	9-2
A. The Importance of Understandable Terms and Definitions	9-2
B. Formal Versus Informal Speech	9-4
C. Language Level as a Barrier, a Diagnostic Tool, and a Solution	9-5
D. Value of Written Materials	9-5
E. Recognizing the Literacy Barrier	9-6
F. Overcoming the Literacy Barrier	9-7
III. Increasing Listener Comprehension	9-8
A. Setting Ground Rules	9-8
B. Providing a Mental Map	9-8
C. Using Repetition	9-9
D. Using Paraphrasing	9-9
E. Asking Questions to Clarify Comprehension	9-9
IV. Nonverbal Communication	9-10
A. Cultural Context of Nonverbal Communication	9-10

B.	Paths of Nonverbal Communication	9-11
C.	Effective Nonverbal Communication	9-11
V.	Effective Listening Techniques	9-12
A.	Active Listening: Capturing and Confirming the Message	9-12
B.	Additional Tips for Better Listening	9-14
C.	Constructive Feedback for the Listener	9-15
D.	Tips for Helping Others Listen Better	9-16
VI.	Potential External Barriers to Communication	9-17
A.	Physiological and Environmental Factors	9-17
B.	Individual Differences and Assumptions	9-17
C.	Bias, Both Conscious and Unconscious	9-17
VII.	Tools for Dealing With Cross-Cultural Communication Issues	9-18
	Conclusion	9-20

9

Communication Tools

Introduction

Communication is the foundation of all our interactions with others. It influences how we perceive and judge not only other people but also the facts and circumstances of cases. The court system rests heavily on the communication skills of its various participants. This chapter surveys the communications challenges facing judges in cases involving persons representing themselves. It describes techniques that judges can use to get the information they need to make appropriate decisions and to convey those decisions in ways that are more likely to result in compliance.

I. Communication Challenges With Self-Represented Litigants

Under the time pressure and stress of heavy and intense calendars, judges must determine how they can best perform their fact-finding and decision-making functions when the involved parties are not legally trained or familiar with courtroom culture. Judges have to decide how to make sure that parties who do not have attorneys as intermediaries nonetheless understand and comply with the court's orders and rulings. How can a judge make sure that justice is not more difficult to attain for self-represented litigants than for those with counsel?

A judge's communication skills—something that everyone can improve—will help determine success in this endeavor. A judge's communication choices will influence not only the amount and quality of the information successfully conveyed in the courtroom (both information given and information received) but also the likelihood of compliance with court orders and, ultimately, both the actual and perceived fairness of the court proceedings.

Good communication also involves being aware of those persons in the courtroom who are waiting for their cases to be heard. Through “teachable moments” the bench officer can draw the audience’s attention to the cases being heard, increasing their comprehension of the process and the ability of persons in the audience to work within the process when their own cases are called.

Verbal communication refers to the words used, either written or spoken. Nonverbal communication is everything communicated except the words. It includes vocal elements—how something is said—as well as what is commonly called “body language.” Listening, of course, is another basic element of communication, one that usually combines both verbal and nonverbal communication.

Communication between the judge and self-represented litigants will necessarily involve the content of actual words spoken or written, how those words are conveyed, and listening or reading skills. Word content can be general or specialized (e.g., “legalese”), formal or informal, and high- or low-grade-level equivalent, and the context within which words are conveyed can increase or decrease the likelihood of their comprehension. Nonverbal communication can be even more significant than verbal communication, and listening may be the most used but least taught communication skill.

II. Word Content, Formality, and Overall Language Level

A. The Importance of Understandable Terms and Definitions

In all cases, especially those involving self-represented litigants, it is important to try to make sure that the information and ideas conveyed are understood by listeners, whether those listeners have a law degree or not. Consider the terms used. Obviously, judges must be able to use and understand legal vocabulary, but they do not always have to use it. Using the specialized language of a profession can be a good shortcut if everyone understands it, but it is not a good shortcut if the listener does not understand it.

When there is no alternative to the use of a specific legal term and there is a possibility that the parties may not understand it, it is helpful to briefly explain the term. It is not necessary to sound erudite in order to sound professional and to have the record hold up on review. On the contrary, adapting to the listener is a hallmark of an effective communicator in any field. And it is essential in dealing with self-represented litigants.

Most professionals are not aware of how specialized their language is. When professionals think back to law school or to any time that they were introduced to a new area of law, some terms that might have seemed incomprehensible at first are probably now second nature. Like most professionals, judges tend to think in the “terms of art” of their profession, some to the point where they cannot “translate” legal terms except by using more of them.

Here are a few commonly used terms and their possible nontechnical equivalents:

1. alleged—claimed
2. appellant—a person who asks a higher court to reverse (or change) the findings of a lower court
3. bears a significant resemblance to—is like
4. in compliance with—comply, follow
5. the court—the judge
6. defendant—the person who is accused or sued
7. effectuate—cause
8. entitlement—having rights to particular benefits
9. evidence—what is used as proof to establish facts, including testimony from the parties, testimony from witnesses, or exhibits (documents or other objects)
10. exhibit—documents or other objects produced in court as evidence (proof)
11. hearsay—the report of another person’s words; a statement, either oral or written, by a person who is not in court as a witness
12. jurisdiction—the right to decide a case, the official power to make legal decisions and judgments about particular cases
13. legal elements—the components or factors that need to be proved legally
14. litigant—a person involved in a lawsuit
15. make contact with—see, meet, talk to
16. moving party—the person who asked the court to make a decision
17. obtain relief—to receive a court award of damages or an order requiring the defendant to do or not do something
18. the parties—the sides

19. petitioner—the person who asked the court to make a decision
20. plaintiff—the person who brings a case against another in a court of law
21. the proceeding—the action taken in court, what’s happening in court
22. prove the elements—demonstrate the truth or the existence of the necessary components
23. provisions of law—law
24. pursuant to—under
25. respondent—the defendant in a lawsuit, someone who has to respond to or answer the claims of a person who asked the court to make a ruling
26. rules of evidence—the rules for what is considered evidence or proof in a court of law, and how that evidence must be presented
27. sufficient number of—enough
28. under oath—sworn to tell the truth
29. weight—importance

Many judges find it useful to think through common questions to ask them in a way to make it more likely to get better information.

Does the matter stand submitted?

Do you have anything else to say before I make my ruling?

Did you cause to be filed?

Did you file?

Do you want a continuance?

Do you want to have this hearing at a later date?

B. Formal Versus Informal Speech

To communicate better with self-represented litigants, many judges find it helpful to use practices common to informal spoken language even in the more formal environment of the court.

Less formal language includes the use of the following:

1. Contractions—“it’s,” not “it is”;
2. Shorter sentences;

3. First and second person—"I," "we," and "you," not third person (e.g., "one");
4. Active voice—"You need to understand," not passive ("It should be understood"); and
5. Informal connectors to open a sentence—"And," "Now," "Then," "Because," not "Additionally," "At this point in time," "Subsequently," "In light of the fact that."

C. Language Level as a Barrier, a Diagnostic Tool, and a Solution

Judges should be aware of the level, or grade equivalent of language, and adapt it so that it is accessible to listeners, without being condescending. Most commonly used software programs have measures for assessing the grade level of a document. Measures such as the Flesch-Kincaid Grade Level Score, which is included as a tool in Word and WordPerfect, include the word length (how many letters), sentence length (how many words), sentences per paragraph, and use of the passive voice. Using these tools can be very helpful.

D. Value of Written Materials

Some information is best provided in written form. When information is complex or lengthy, a handout—ideally with oral summaries or a question-and-answer session—reduces pressure on the listeners and makes it more likely they will both receive and process the information. Some written material is best provided before the court proceeding (e.g., by the clerk, through Web sites or self-help centers), which will greatly increase the likelihood that both sides will be better prepared.<sup>93</sup> By being in writing, it also allows for multilingual translation and gives litigants the opportunity to obtain help to understand the materials. Some information is important enough to be conveyed in both written and spoken form.

---

<sup>93</sup> Albrecht et al., p. 45.

E. Recognizing the Literacy Barrier

However, judges must always remember that as a practical matter, information given in written form is inaccessible to many of the self-represented.

It is estimated that over 2 million native English speakers in California are functionally illiterate,<sup>94</sup> which is defined as being unable to read, write, and communicate in English at a level necessary to function on the job and in society. The Correctional Education Association estimates that 65 percent of adult prisoners are functionally illiterate.<sup>95</sup>

In Judging for the 21st Century: A Problem-Solving Approach, Justice Paul Bentley (Ontario Court of Justice, Ottawa, Canada) has written that

Judges must learn to recognize and read the signs of low literacy. People may try to hide literacy problems by:

- Saying they cannot read a document because they forgot to bring reading glasses;
- Claiming to have lost, discarded, forgotten to bring, or not to have had time to read documents;
- Asking to take home forms to “read later”;
- Claiming to have a hurt arm and are therefore unable to write;
- Glancing quickly at a document and then changing the subject, or becoming traumatized, quiet, or uncommunicative when faced with a document;
- Hesitating when asked to read a document and/or reading it excessively slowly; or
- Appearing to read a document very quickly, although they are unable to summarize its contents.”<sup>96</sup>

---

<sup>94</sup> S. White and S. Dillow, Key Concepts and Features of the 2003 National Assessment of Adult Literacy (National Center for Education Statistics, U.S. Department of Education, 2005); available online at <http://nces.ed.gov/pubsearch/pubsinfo.asp?pubid=2006471> L. Jenkins and I. Kirsch, Adult Literacy in California: Results of the State Adult Literacy Survey (Educational Testing Service, 1994).

<sup>95</sup> A. Bazos and J. Hausmann, Correctional Education as a Crime Control Problem (UCLA School of Public Policy and Social Research, 2004), p. 28.

<sup>96</sup> P. Bentley, Judging for the 21st Century: A Problem-Solving Approach (National Judicial Institute, Canada, 2005). Available online at <http://www.nji.ca/nji/Public/documents/Judgingfor21scenturyDe.pdf>

Possible markers of low literacy include the following:

1. A person who has not completed high school or has difficulty speaking English;
2. A person who has filled in a form with the wrong information or has made many spelling and grammatical errors;
3. A person who claims to go to legal aid every day, but states that he or she doesn't have time to fill in the relevant forms;
4. A person who seems not to relate to or understand questions about particular times, dates, and places;
5. A person whose writing and speaking styles don't match; or
6. A pre-sentence report that indicates that an individual left school at a young age or before completing grade 10, or that chronicles a history of unemployment or refusal of job training, promotion, or reassignment.

Persons who have limited literacy skills may attempt to cope with feelings of fear, embarrassment, or inadequacy by behaving in ways that can appear flippant, dishonest, indifferent, uncooperative, belligerent, defensive, evasive, indecisive, frustrated, or angry. These emotional markers of low literacy may appear on the surface to be markers of a "bad attitude."

F. Overcoming the Literacy Barrier

To address low literacy in the courtroom, judges can do the following:

1. Be aware of their own biases relating to low literacy – remember – low literacy does not equal low intelligence.
2. Educate themselves about low literacy in their community and in the courtroom;
3. Make it easier for people to understand by
  - a. Slowing down,
  - b. Doing as much orally as possible,
  - c. Speaking clearly and repeating important information,
  - d. Supplementing oral information with a written note that the person can mull over in private or have someone read later, and

- e. Previewing or reading aloud documents in the courtroom;
- 5. Keep literacy in mind when sentencing; consider literacy training as part of rehabilitation; keep in mind that most rehabilitative programs (job skills training, anger management, substance abuse, spousal abuse, etc.) are literacy based; or
  - a. Use plain language instead of “legalese,”
  - b. Use short sentences and clear language,
  - c. Use words consistently,
  - d. Use the active voice, and
  - e. Avoid strings of infinitives (“authorize and empower”).

III. Increasing Listener Comprehension

Various techniques have been shown to increase a listener’s comprehension of verbal information.

A. Setting Ground Rules

It is far easier for people to follow the rules when they know what they are. For example, courtroom protocol includes wearing appropriate clothing, standing when the judge enters the courtroom, not interrupting, and so forth. These ground rules may be available in written form at different steps in the process such as at the clerk’s office, self-help centers, or legal services offices. They can also be conveyed by a court clerk, self-help center staff, or bailiff. Procedural examples include how to state objections and how to present different types of evidence.

B. Providing a Mental Map

It is helpful to give court participants a “mental map” of what’s ahead—what will take place. After each major stage, judges should let them know where they are in the process and what comes next.

For example, the following statement could be used: “The first thing I need to find out is whether this court has jurisdiction—that is, the court’s power to decide this case. Then I need to find out whether the financial situation of the parent who does not have custody has changed, and if it has, I need to decide what change in monthly support would be appropriate.”<sup>97</sup>

C. Using Repetition

Given that this is often new information to self-represented litigants, it can be helpful to repeat important information. As mentioned above, judges will want to consider having important information in both written and spoken form. It is helpful if the same information is also conveyed to litigants at all steps in the process so that the clerks, self-help center staff, and court are providing consistent information to litigants.

D. Using Paraphrasing

It is often productive to ask court participants to paraphrase important information out loud in their own words to check their understanding. This will also increase retention.

This example combines explanation and paraphrasing: “You are required to sign a piece of paper promising the court to do certain things. If you do not keep your promise, the consequences are . . . Are you clear what you need to do? What is that?”

E. Asking Questions to Clarify Comprehension

Frequently ask if court participants have questions, and PAUSE—for at least 5 seconds for fairly basic questions and at least 8–10 seconds for more complex ones. Make sure that participants understand that it’s okay to have questions.

1. Count to yourself if necessary to make sure the pause is long enough to allow listeners to process your question and formulate their own.
2. Use nonverbal behaviors to show that you are open to questions. Include some of the following: establish eye contact, pause, sit up straight or lean forward slightly, tilt your head a little to one side, use a nonthreatening vocal tone, gesture with open hands.

---

<sup>97</sup> Adapted from Albrecht et al., p. 46.

Formatted: Font: Italic

3. Watch the listener's nonverbal cues to see if he or she has questions but is hesitant to ask them. This is especially important for people who speak English as a second language or others who might be confused or intimidated by the surroundings and the process.
4. Answer likely questions even if your listeners don't ask them, if you think the information is important. "A question people often have is . . ."

IV. Nonverbal Communication

A. Cultural Context of Nonverbal Communication

Anytime oral communication is involved, nonverbal communication is a factor. Even when the judge is not speaking, he or she is still communicating nonverbally. Indeed, nonverbal messages can be more significant than verbal ones. They cannot be avoided, they vary with background and culture, and they are often difficult to interpret.

Within the courtroom setting, nonverbal communications reflect the relationships between various pairs of participants, build confidence and trust in the judge and in the process, and help maintain courtroom traditions. Consciously or, more often, unconsciously, they affect perceptions of credibility and are interpreted as expressing emotion.

Research on communication shows that we rely on nonverbal behaviors even though we often misinterpret them and even though there are no absolute formulas for their interpretation. For instance, crossed arms do not always mean "closed to communication," although some people might respond to crossed arms as if they do. Interpretation of nonverbal behavior becomes more accurate when "clusters" of behavior, or several behaviors, indicate the same conclusion.

There are, of course, major cultural differences over the meaning and interpretation of nonverbal behaviors. For example, the accepted length of a pause before answering a question varies greatly—some cultures consider it disrespectful to answer too quickly (it's more respectful to really consider the question before answering it). These differences take effort to understand, and while they are not the specific subject of this benchguide, they indicate the need to be cautious in cross-cultural situations when interpreting the nonverbal behavior of persons from various cultures.

B. Paths of Nonverbal Communication

Judges should be aware that they are sending—and receiving—messages through all of these nonverbal paths:

1. Voice (volume, articulation, pace and rhythm, pitch and inflections, pauses);
2. Eye contact;
3. Facial expressions;
4. Gestures;
5. Posture, movement, and body orientation;
6. Use of space and room arrangement;
7. Appearance and objects (clothing, jewelry, items on the bench, etc.);
8. Time (on time or not, time allotted, time allowed to speak, etc.);
9. Silence (differences in meanings assigned to silence, length of silence); and
10. Others—anything that people can interpret as being meaningful is communication (blushing, sweating, blinking, touching, crying, etc.).

C. Effective Nonverbal Communication

The following are tools for effective nonverbal communication on the bench:

1. Awareness of the communicative power of voice-vocal tone and inflections are key components in conveying respect for others. In addition, the rate of speaking will have an impact on the message's clarity, something that is particularly important when there are cultural differences.
2. Looking at a person while they are speaking shows attentiveness and makes it easier to see the speaker's body language and to regulate the interaction better.

Judges should not be offended when litigants are shy about looking at them—power and cultural differences are often reflected this way.

3. Orientation of the body toward the speaker and sitting up straight or leaning forward slightly demonstrates engagement in the interaction, reinforces that the speaker should be directing his or her remarks to the judge, and encourages more active listening.
4. If verbal and nonverbal behaviors are inconsistent, people tend to believe the nonverbals. Maintaining congruence between the verbal and nonverbal messages, that is, sending a consistent message will reduce uncertainty and add strength to the message.

V. Effective Listening Techniques

Effective listening means understanding the speaker's entire message, bringing together verbal and nonverbal communication skills. As the proverb says, "Speaking is when you sow, listening is when you reap." The skills discussed below should be considered from the perspective of the judge as listener and of others in the courtroom as they listen to the judge.

A. Active Listening: Capturing and Confirming the Message

Active listening usually involves four steps. First, focus on the speaker and his or her message. This should involve both being attentive and receptive and demonstrating that the listener is attentive and receptive—using nonverbal behaviors such as eye contact, nods, a positive tone of voice, and upright posture or a slight forward lean as well as verbal encouragers such as "I see," "Mm hmm," "Go on."

If the listener has to look down to take notes, he or she should explain that "what you are telling me is important and I am writing it down. I may not be looking at you when I am writing, but I am listening. Please continue."

Second, draw out the message as necessary. It might be necessary to initiate the interaction, to encourage fuller responses or bring the speaker back from a tangent. Of course, one of the best ways to do this is to ask questions. The type of question will affect the answer.

1. Close-ended questions allow for short, direct answers; they often start with is, are, did, do, when. These are effective when specific information is needed and when it is necessary to establish control of the topic or the proceeding.
2. Open-ended questions allow for a broader range of responses; they often start with what, how, why, describe, explain, tell, give an example. These are effective when probing for information and when answers of greater depth are needed. Examples include "How so?" "Give me a little more information about," "Help me understand," "Tell me more about," "Give me some specific details about," and "Give me a word picture—like a slow-motion instant replay of."

Third, communicate understanding of the message. There are usually several levels of meaning in every exchange.

1. Content: facts, information. Paraphrasing is one of the most useful tools there is for checking (and showing) understanding of a message's content.
  - a. "If I understand you correctly . . ."
  - b. "What I'm hearing is . . . Is that right?"
  - c. "So, you're saying . . . ?"
2. Emotions: feelings, reactions. When emotions play an important role in the message, it can be effective to acknowledge their existence. Even if the emotions aren't relevant to your decision, reflecting the emotions back lets the litigants know they've been heard and often allows them to move past the emotions to give you the information needed.
  - a. "It sounds like you're very frustrated. What I need from you now to help me make my decision is . . ."

- b. "I'm sorry that you and your family are going through this at this time; could you tell me more about . . ."
  3. Intent: why they're giving you this message, what they're trying to achieve with it, what the connection to the overall proceeding is.
    - a. "You believe this information proves that . . ."
    - b. "You want to make sure that I understand that . . ."

Fourth, encourage confirmation or clarification of the meaning. To make sure that the listener got the message, the judge should give the litigant a chance to verify or clarify the judge's interpretation ("Yes, that's what I meant" or "Well, not quite, your honor. What I meant was . . .").

Voicing the speaker's own feelings can be useful in conveying empathy: "I can tell that you really tried to..."; "I can tell that you really care about ..." <sup>98</sup>

B. Additional Tips for Better Listening

1. Listeners should begin with the desire to listen. Attitude affects effectiveness.
2. Listeners should focus on the message. Tune out distractions, including those created by the speakers themselves (e.g., nervous quirks) and their own internal distractions.
3. Listeners should try to understand the speaker's viewpoint. Life experiences affect perspective. Some effort can overcome the potential for misunderstanding that sometimes comes with differing life experiences.
4. Listeners should withhold judgment as long as possible. Once we label something as right or wrong, good or bad, we lose objectivity.

---

<sup>98</sup> Ibid.

5. Listeners should reinforce the message. Everyone can think four times faster than most people speak. One can become a better listener by making good use of this ratio—mentally repeat, paraphrase, and summarize what the speaker is saying.
6. Listeners should provide feedback. They can use both the verbal and nonverbal channels when possible. (See below for tips on giving verbal feedback.)
7. Listeners should listen with their whole body and look at the speaker. Being physically ready to listen usually includes sitting erect, leaning slightly forward, and placing both feet flat on the floor. Not only will the speaker feel that the listener is actually listening to them, but the listener is more likely to listen better (behavior both reflects and affects attitudes).
8. Listeners should listen critically. Even though listeners should try to understand a speaker's viewpoint and withhold early judgment, they obviously need to test the merits of what is heard. This is the real balance—being open-minded and being able to critically evaluate what is heard and the credibility of the sources.

C. Constructive Feedback for the Listener

When it is particularly important that the listener receive feedback, the following tips may make it less likely that the listener will become defensive and tune the message out. Speakers should do the following:

1. Begin with a positive statement;
2. Be specific—make clear both what is meant and what is to be done about it;
3. Be honest but tactful (a real skill!);
4. Personalize your comments by using the listener's name occasionally and using "I" language to describe your perceptions and reactions, to reduce defensiveness and help establish rapport;
5. Reinforce the positive and mention what they've done well;
6. Tell them what's in it for them (positive consequences of getting this feedback);

7. Emphasize a problem-solving approach to the negative; and
8. End with a positive statement. Sandwiching the negatives between positives makes them more palatable.

D. Tips for Helping Others Listen Better

Judges should also consider these choices in addition to using the techniques discussed earlier.

1. Visual Supporting Materials. Getting the information through more than one channel enhances comprehension and retention. There are many different types of learners—visual and auditory are two—and using more than one channel will build on the strengths of more listeners and reinforce the information for everyone.<sup>99</sup>
2. Conducive Listening Environment. Even though speakers may not have control over such factors as the acoustics, the seating and temperature, the frequency of breaks, the ambient noise, the number of interruptions, and so forth, they can significantly affect how well the listeners can concentrate. Controlling the factors that one can, and balancing the others by using as many techniques as possible for better communication, will help.
3. Decreasing “Distance.” The courtroom environment and procedure, including the level at which the judge sits and the robe and demeanor, establish the judge’s clear position of authority. But “judicial demeanor” does not mean that a judge has to be intimidating. Judges should speak directly and personally to the litigants. The judge will appear to be more in control and will get better responses when they seem comfortable with the litigants as people and appear to want to understand their needs and problems.
4. Building Self-Awareness and Skills. A speaker’s mannerisms can distract even good listeners—try to identify any distracting habits (videotaping can help to identify these) and to work on removing them.

---

<sup>99</sup> Ibid.

VI. Potential External Barriers to Communication

The following can be significant barriers to communication.

A. Physiological and Environmental Factors

1. Thinking ahead of the speaker;
2. Preoccupation/boredom;
3. Message overload/listener fatigue;
4. Physical distractions (noise, disruption);
5. Stress, physical discomfort, fear;
6. Mental illness; and
7. Time pressures.

B. Individual Differences and Assumptions

1. Personal mannerisms;
2. Fear of appearing ignorant; and
3. Assuming that listening is passive and effective communication is the responsibility of the speaker.

C. Bias, Both Conscious and Unconscious

1. Power or status;
2. Language comprehension and proficiency;
3. Accent;
4. Culture or ethnicity;
5. Economic level or factors;
6. Gender and sexual orientation;
7. Education level;
8. Age;
9. Physical or mental ability or disability;
10. Appearance; and
11. Other differences.

VII. Tools for Dealing With Cross-Cultural Communication Issues

Cultural norms and values shape all communication experiences. Because the mainstream American culture and justice system place a high value on explicit, direct communication (what is said—the content and exact meaning of words), there is ample opportunity, if not a likelihood, for miscommunication in cross-cultural exchanges where the context of words, how words are said or written, and the circumstances surrounding the communication event are emphasized. Strategies to minimize potential barriers created by cross-cultural communication include all the techniques; especially listening, mentioned but might also include the following.

Speakers should

1. Speak audibly and distinctly, but without exaggeration;
2. Speak in a relaxed and unhurried manner, and slowly, if necessary;
3. Not speak louder in an effort to be understood (a common reaction, but often interpreted as intimidating, even hostile);
4. Be willing to take the time to explain or rephrase what is said, if necessary;
5. Communicate concepts clearly and in an orderly manner;
6. Give examples to demonstrate;
7. Learn the correct pronunciation of a person's name;
8. Not expect tone of voice that is meant to convey emotion (e.g., sarcasm, humor, praise, blame) to be understood (messages not intended literally may be interpreted as such);
9. Avoid colloquialisms, slang, and mixed language;
10. Not rely on eye contact (or lack thereof) to indicate respect, honesty, credibility, guilt, and innocence;
11. Not ask questions in the negative;
12. Remember that "Yes" or "OK" may mean "I am listening" or "I have heard what you said" rather than agreement, or that nodding may be a sign of respect, not of agreement; and
13. Understand that nondirect answers, or brief limited answers, are not necessarily signs of lying or withholding.

Listeners should

1. Ask the speaker to slow down, enunciate more clearly, repeat, rephrase, or simplify;

2. Rephrase or summarize for clarification and confirmation; Make it clear that you really want to understand what the speaker is saying;
3. Not interrupt, unless necessary;
4. Respect silence;
5. Allow extra time;
6. Not make assumptions about facial expressions, body movement, or hand gestures (or lack thereof);
7. Not make assumptions about tone of voice or nonlanguage sounds;
8. Not misinterpret an effort to make oneself understood by speaking more loudly as anger or aggression;
9. Not interpret silence as agreement;
10. Expose themselves to different accents to get used to them; and
11. Educate themselves as much as possible on cultural issues of the communities the court serves.

In asking questions of persons from different cultures, it is helpful to remember that the frame of reference can make a large difference in communications. For example:

Context is so important! I once interpreted in a case where a Guatemalan was asked to describe one of the parties. He said that she was a tall blonde. Well, that was true from his perspective, but to the judge and most members of the jury, she looked more like a medium-height brunette. And it seemed like he was lying. Instead of asking for a description, I recommend that judges ask if there is a person in the courtroom who looks like the person being discussed.

- Court Interpreter

1. Persons who have grown up in most countries other than the United States or England use the metric system. It may be easier to ask the person to compare the length of the object in question to something in the courtroom.
2. In many countries, December 14 would be written as 14/12 rather than as 12/14. In asking about dates, it is helpful to ask for the name of the month and date.

3. In Mexico, the father's surname appears first and the mother's second. For example, Jose Garcia Chavez would generally go by the name of Jose Garcia. Judges may want to ask what the father's last name is in order to determine the person's "official" last name.
4. Students in Spanish-speaking countries are generally not taught to spell in their head. Thus it can be difficult to spell their name out for the judge or court reporter. It is generally better to give them the opportunity to write out their name in order to avoid discomfort and misspellings.
5. In traffic cases, questions like "Were you going southbound or northbound?" may be difficult to answer for persons from cultures more apt to think of landmarks—toward the ocean, toward the mountains, toward the city.
6. Many persons from other cultures find it rude to point at others. Thus they can be asked where the person is sitting, what clothing they're wearing, or similar identifying questions.

Conclusion

Judges who use the techniques in this chapter report that they obtain more information from litigants on which to base a decision and that they feel more in control of their courtroom. Research indicates that good communication results in a higher level of compliance with court orders.<sup>100</sup> Thus these techniques have the potential not only to make the judicial experience more satisfying but also to improve the quality of justice.

---

<sup>100</sup> D. Eckberg and M. Podkopacz, Family Court Fairness Study (Fourth Judicial District of the State of Minnesota, Fourth Judicial District Research Division, 2004).

Chapter 10: avoiding unintended bias

Introduction 10-13

I. The Roots and Dynamics of Unintended Bias 10-13

II. Social Science and the Dynamics of Unintended Bias 10-23

- A. Categorization of and Preference for People Based on Group Identity 10-3
- B. Human Brains Encode Information About Groups of People Into Memories 10-4
- C. Humans Strongly Prefer Persons From the Same Social Categories 10-4
- D. Humans Tend to Perceive "Out-Group" Members as All the Same 10-4
- E. Preference for Members of In-Groups Begins at an Early Age 10-5
- F. Human Brains More Readily Process Information That Confirms Our Beliefs, Attitudes, or Stereotypes 10-5
- G. These Early Beliefs, Attitudes, or Stereotypes Continue to Exist at an Unconscious Level 10-6
- H. Implicit Bias Affects Even Nonverbal Behavior 10-6
- I. Implicit Bias Increases Under Certain Circumstances 10-7
- J. Emotional State Can Also Influence the Tendency to Implicit Bias 10-7

III. Implications for the Judicial Fact-Finding and Decision-Making Process in Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants 10-8

IV. Specific Techniques to Minimize Implicit Bias 10-9

- A. Stay Motivated to Be Fair and Accurate 10-9
- B. Maximize Accountability 10-10
- C. Take Ample Time 10-10
- D. Minimize Distraction and Pay Attention 10-10
- E. Be Conscious of Difference 10-11
- F. Think About Thinking 10-11
- G. Confront Cultural Stereotypes 10-12
- H. Seek out Images and Social Environments That Challenge Stereotypes 10-12
- I. Maintain Constant Vigilance 10-13

| Conclusion 10-133

10

Avoiding Unintended Bias

Introduction

One of the special challenges of dealing with self-represented litigants is that judges have to interact with people from a wide variety of cultures and backgrounds without a lawyer acting as the “translator.”

This chapter describes the often serious unintended problems that this can cause for access to justice for the self-represented, takes the experiences and insights of many judges, and suggests ways that judges can work to overcome these dynamics in their judging.

I. The Roots and Dynamics of Unintended Bias

Lawyers have generally been to law school for at least three years. They’ve spent time with other law students and lawyers. They’ve read cases, watched hearings, and often have years of experience in the courtroom. They know the legal shorthand used in most types of cases. Often they’ve appeared in front of a particular judge on multiple occasions. They generally understand what information that particular judge wants, which issues are relevant and which are not, and they are not as emotionally involved in the case as their client is. A judge can therefore interact with all attorneys in pretty much the same way; a judge does not have to adapt his or her style to accommodate the minor differences among the attorneys.

In contrast, most people representing themselves have had very little contact with the court system. They know a lot about the facts in their case, but they often don’t know how to fit that knowledge into a legal solution. They don’t know what to expect in court.

Sometimes they’ve come from other countries where it may be disrespectful to look a person in authority in the eye—or where going to court means paying money in bribes or being fearful of going to jail. Sometimes they’ve gone to court in different states or for different types of cases and have expectations based on those experiences. Most have family or friends who've had some type of experience in court, and those people have given suggestions that vary dramatically in their helpfulness. Most people have seen Judge Judy or L.A. Law or Perry Mason or Judging Amy or The People's Court or Kramer vs. Kramer or My Cousin Vinny. They know that it isn't all true, but it still forms some part of their understanding of the legal system and shapes their expectations.

The Canons of Ethics require judges to act without bias. But when dealing with litigants directly—people of all colors, economic backgrounds, cultural backgrounds, and mental capacities—it is well-nigh impossible that judges won't have some biases to confront and consider. Most judges aren't even aware of these biases, but it's important to consider these issues while being a judge in one of the most diverse areas in the world.

As a lawyer and now a judge, I've always worked in a culture where most of my colleagues are quite smart and articulate. We all went to school for many years, read a lot, and write well. I was really shocked to learn that half of the American people read at less than fifth-grade reading level—and that doesn't even count litigants who come from other countries, many of whom had few opportunities for organized education. I find that when I read a pleading from someone who clearly has problems with writing or spelling, I remind myself not to confuse literacy with stupidity. I figure they can probably fix a car or my computer much easier than I can. Sometimes it's really frustrating, but overall, I'm really proud that our court system is open enough that everyone can have their day in court (even if they can't spell).
—Judicial officer

II. Social Science and the Dynamics of Unintended Bias

The field of social cognition (the study of the relationship between mental processes and social behavior) offers one way to think about these issues. Research in this field helps us understand the natural processes of categorization of and preference for people based on group identity. In one study, judges (like other groups) demonstrated the following common cognitive illusions:<sup>101</sup>

1. Anchoring (making estimates based on irrelevant starting points);<sup>102</sup>
2. Framing (treating economically equivalent gains and losses differently);<sup>103</sup>
3. Hindsight bias (perceiving past events to have been more predictable than they actually were);
4. Representativeness (ignoring important background statistical information in favor of individuating information); and
5. Egocentric biases (overestimating one's own abilities).

The following conclusions drawn from cognitive science research provide judges with valuable insight into the human vulnerability to unintended bias.

A. Categorization of and Preference for People Based on Group Identity

In fact, the human ability to categorize experience is an indispensable cognitive device for understanding, negotiating, and constructing the world.<sup>104</sup>

The human mind tends to organize everything, including people, into categories. Social scientists believe that this mental process may have

---

<sup>101</sup> C. Guthrie, J. Rachlinski, and A. Wistrich, Inside the Judicial Mind (2001), -86 CORNELL L. REV. 777 (2001).

<sup>102</sup> For instance, if a class of students is asked whether the Mississippi River is longer or shorter than 2,000 miles and then asked the river's length, and a second class is asked whether the Mississippi River is longer or shorter than 500 miles and then asked the river's length, the first class will invariably provide answers that are higher than those given by the second class.

<sup>103</sup> For instance, most people will prefer a certain $100 gain to a 50 percent chance of winning $200. On the other hand, most will prefer a 50 percent chance of losing $200 to a certain loss of $100. In other words, people tend to make risk-averse decisions when choosing between options that appear to represent gains and risk-seeking decisions when choosing between options that appear to represent losses.

<sup>104</sup> R. Brown, Prejudice: Its Social Psychology (1995), p. 39.

Formatted: Small caps

Formatted: Font: Italic

prehistoric roots, ensuring the survival of our genetic code. Today it translates into social categorization, or grouping people based on any number of characteristics, including race, ethnicity, skin color, gender, age, sexual orientation, physical and mental abilities, religion, economic status, language ability, education level, and so forth.

Within a fraction of a second of encountering another person, human brains register automatically and without conscious awareness that person's race, sex, and age. Our brains take "short cuts" to deal with, organize, and simplify a complex world. These are sometimes referred to as heuristics.

B. Human Brains Encode Information About Groups of People Into Memories

These mental constructs are sometimes called "schemas." In this way, brains can be likened to computer hardware—what goes in that hardware will differ from person to person, but humans all process, code, store, and retrieve data similarly.

Similar to categorization, stereotyping is a mental shortcut that forms associations between groups of people and the attributes we believe typical of those groups. Stereotypes can also be either positive or negative. One might, for example, have a stereotype of all lawyers from one law school as smart and another law school as dumb.

C. Humans Strongly Prefer Persons From the Same Social Categories

This phenomenon is sometimes called in-group favoritism and out-group derogation. Whether these preferences are strong or weak, or whether they exist at all (there are instances where people prefer those in groups to which they do not belong, for example) will vary from person to person.

D. Humans Tend to Perceive "Out-Group" Members as All the Same

An example of this is the “they all look the same” phenomenon. We also engage in in-group overexclusion whereby ambiguities as to whether someone belongs or does not belong to our group are most likely to be resolved against inclusion.

E. Preference for Members of In-Groups Begins at an Early Age

These preferences become automatic, habitual lenses through which we view the world. Children can show in-group preference before the age of two.

Children exposed to racial diversity at an early age often exhibit a clear absence of in-group favoritism and out-group derogation.

However, contact alone is generally not enough, and other factors must be present:

1. There should be institutional support for the measures designed to promote the contact;
2. The contact should be of sufficient frequency, duration, and closeness to permit meaningful relationships to develop between members of the groups concerned;
3. As much as possible, the participants in the contact situation should be of equal status; and
4. The contact should involve cooperative activity.<sup>105</sup>

F. Human Brains More Readily Process Information That Confirms Our Beliefs, Attitudes, or Stereotypes

In fact, when humans are faced with information inconsistent with our beliefs, we revise them under certain circumstances, but we are more likely to create a subgroup category (an exception), leaving the initial general belief intact. This is especially true when the out-group is large and the association or stereotype negative.

---

<sup>105</sup> Ibid., pp. 268–69.

Some examples of this are “You’re different from (or ‘not like’) other _____”, or “You can come home for Thanksgiving, but don’t bring your _____ friends.” Thus stereotypes are much like heat-seeking missiles in search of confirming information.

We also have a propensity to ascribe the mistakes or failures of others to their inherent qualities or flaws but our own mistakes or failures and those of people in our in-groups to external circumstances.

G. These Early Beliefs, Attitudes, or Stereotypes Continue to Exist at an Unconscious Level

These biases may persist despite a commitment to moral and ethical principles such as equal justice, honesty, and integrity in decision making, or to making decisions based only on the facts and circumstances of each case.

H. Implicit Bias Affects Even Nonverbal Behavior

Research indicates that the extent of teachers’ differing expectations about girls’ and boys’ abilities to learn various subjects is directly correlated to girls’ and boys’ subsequent actual learning in those subjects.<sup>106</sup>

This phenomenon has been repeatedly demonstrated in studies of the interview process. Without knowing the purpose of these experiments, interviewers consistently sit farther from, are less friendly to, make more speech errors, and take less time with interviewees who are members of disfavored groups. Conversely, interviewees who are interviewed by experimenters who are instructed to exhibit these behaviors deliberately mirror the behaviors.

---

<sup>106</sup> M. Palardy, “The Effects of Teachers’ Expectations on Children’s Literacy Development,” Journal of Reading Improvement 35(4) (1998): 184–86 (1998); P. Murphy, and E. Whitelegg, “Girls and Physics: Continuing Barriers to ‘Belonging,’” Journal of Curriculum Studies 38(3) (2006): 281–305 (2006).

- Formatted: Font: Italic
- Formatted: Font: Italic
- Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps
- Formatted: Font: Italic
- Formatted: Font: Italic

I. Implicit Bias Increases Under Certain Circumstances

These circumstances include stress, time pressure, distraction, boredom, absence of accountability, and lack of motivation to be fair and accurate.

This poses real challenges for judges, who are often under stress, lack time, and are distracted and bored.

Of course, judges are extremely motivated to be fair and accurate. However, the possibility of implicit bias may arise more in cases with self-represented litigants with no intermediary lawyer to facilitate or carry out the communication, or when some judges may feel less accountability where there is less likelihood of an appeal.

In one interesting experiment on accountability, subjects who were convinced that a (bogus) skin electrode apparatus could detect their “true” feelings were far more willing to report socially sensitive attitudes and stereotypes than those not connected to electrodes.<sup>107</sup>

J. Emotional State Can Also Influence the Tendency to Implicit Bias

Psychologists investigating the link between emotions and prejudice have found that anger increases the likelihood of a negative reaction to members of a different group and that sadness or a neutral emotion does not.

They have also found that the responses of happy people are quite similar to those of angry people—both are more likely to draw on negative stereotypes when judging guilt or innocence. Sad people “may have been in a frame of mind that led them to evaluate the case histories more slowly and to reach more judicious conclusions.” Sad people were, if anything, biased in favor of those linked with negative stereotypes.

---

<sup>107</sup> Brown, p. 211.

III. Implications for the Judicial Fact-Finding and Decision-Making Process in Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants

Therefore cases involving self-represented litigants raise the usual unintended biases that judges have to consider in all cases—biases such as race, gender, language, and economic status. The stereotypes to which we are all vulnerable may be triggered more easily during stressful, high-volume, repetitive, time-pressured, tiring calendars—all too often hallmarks of calendars involving self-represented litigants. Moreover, this likelihood might become even greater in the absence of attorneys who normally act as intermediaries between the judge and the litigant and who also bring to the courtroom certain distancing formalities of language, discourse style, and interaction.

In addition to these usual biases, the issue of self-representation can itself bring up various attitudes and assumptions on the part of judges. Some of these include the following beliefs:

1. High-volume/high self-represented litigant calendars are “punishment” assignments;
2. Self-represented litigant calendars are not real “judge work”;
3. Self-represented litigants are unable to effectively represent themselves and are usually unprepared, and their pleadings and papers are unintelligible, do not raise relevant issues, or both;
4. Self-represented litigants are less educated if not illiterate;
5. Self-represented litigants lie;
6. Cases and calendars where one or both parties are self-represented are longer, slower, more stressful, more frustrating, often volatile, and sometimes unsafe;
7. Hearings in which one side is represented and the other is not are prone to numerous evidentiary challenges and accusations of judicial impropriety when efforts are made to “level the playing field”; and
8. If they really wanted to, self-represented litigants could get a lawyer.

The “kernel of truth” notion asserts that stereotypes and assumptions about people must be based on something, so there must be a kernel of truth in each of them. Although some stereotypes (not all) reflect a real difference in averages between groups, it is obvious that stereotypes are unreliable as a basis for making judgments about individuals.

We also need to remember that litigants come to court with various expectations and biases and that those assumptions and biases may also affect how they act in the courtroom.

I use a script at the beginning of my domestic violence calendar. It takes about 10 minutes, and I use it to explain how the day is going to go and set the tone. I don't even have to think about it any more. I watch to see who's sitting with who, who has a little kid that we'll want to get out early, who is really upset, who's laughing at my jokes. It also gives them some time to get used to the idea that I'm a Chinese American woman hearing their case.

—Judge

IV. Specific Techniques to Minimize Implicit Bias

How do we counter these implicit biases to treat everyone as an individual who deserves his or her day in court? Research has shown that the following techniques minimize the potential impact of implicit bias. Strategies that judges report using are in boxes.

A. Stay Motivated to Be Fair and Accurate

Within our system of justice, there are many safeguards against the operation of personal bias in judicial decision making, foremost among them the ethical imperatives that guide and constrain judges. It is unlikely that any judge is not motivated to be fair and accurate. However, research indicates that good intentions are not enough to offset implicit bias. Conscious attention and effort are also needed.

"Remember the canons relative to bias, prejudice, fairness, etc. Remember the Constitution requires a 'neutral, detached magistrate.'"

B. Maximize Accountability

Again, the justice system incorporates various safeguards against the operation of personal bias, including, in most cases, the availability of a record and the opportunity to appeal. Judges have also suggested reviewing their own rulings or decisions for patterns or asking a colleague to periodically observe their courtroom communication or review a difficult ruling.

"Have someone else review my decision if I feel it may contain bias."

C. Take Ample Time

Are hearings with some groups longer? Shorter? Why? Studies in the context of interviewing indicate that interviewers with negative bias toward a certain group take less time, make less eye contact, sit farther from, and make more speech errors (e.g., stuttering, hesitations) when interviewing a member of that group.

"Allow both parties the same amount of time to address the court."

"Prepare in advance about the people and the issues; allot sufficient time for hearings to avoid impatience; listen in the courtroom to make each person become an individual to me."

"Slow down; listen carefully."

D. Minimize Distraction and Pay Attention

Strong emotion, stress, or distraction increase the likelihood of relying on automatic responses. One's physical and mental health will influence one's ability to stay focused.

"Focus hard on the argument being presented to counteract boredom/stress/time pressure."

"Avoid becoming overworked; when overworked, I revert to rote/easy methods of accomplishing things. Bias can creep in when taking the easy way out."

E. Be Conscious of Difference

This may seem somewhat counterintuitive and even dangerous, because we are taught that "justice is blind," that we live in a "color blind society," and that we must "treat everyone the same." In reality, we are acutely aware of differences whether or not we consciously acknowledge them, and we are more likely to make judgments based on implicit biases related to those differences if we attempt to ignore them. Recent research indicates that once the defendant's race in a jury simulation is explicitly referred to and jurors are made aware of the potential for their race bias, they are better able to correct for it.<sup>108</sup>

"I affirmatively recognize that I might have a bias about a person and then consciously put it aside."

F. Think About Thinking

To engage in an intentional thought process, judges might make a conscious effort to wait until all facts are present before judging, as jurors are admonished to do.

"Question basis for determinations—assumptions or facts?; question inferences—accurate or caused by bias?"

<sup>108</sup> S. Sommers and P. Ellsworth, White Juror Bias: An Investigation of Prejudice Against Black Defendants in the American Courtroom (2001) 7(1) Psychology, Public Policy and Law 201-229.

"I try flipping—pretending that the litigants have switched roles. For example, if a litigant is not well-dressed, I pretend that the other litigant is dressed that way and ask myself if I would rule differently."

G. Confront Cultural Stereotypes

Cognitive scientists have developed an online experimental tool, the Implicit Association Test (IAT), that assesses unconscious attitudes, or implicit bias. Data gathered from over 2.5 million online tests reveals, for example, that at least 75 percent of test takers show an implicit bias favoring the young, the rich, and whites.<sup>109</sup>

Readers are encouraged to take the IAT by going to www.implicit.harvard.edu. Most test takers report at least some disparity between their conscious intention and the test results. At the very least the test may direct one's attention to areas in need of self-scrutiny.

"Cross-check analysis (e.g., sentence) with substitute category (male for female, or race)."

H. Seek out Images and Social Environments That Challenge Stereotypes

In "How (Un)ethical Are You?" by Mahzarin R. Banaji and colleagues, the authors describe a judge who, despite a strong belief that her decisions were unbiased, was concerned that she might be harboring unconscious prejudices from working in an environment that daily reinforced the association between black men and crime. She decided to create an alternative environment by spending some time in a neighboring court where the criminals being tried were predominantly white. Malcolm Gladwell, in the bestseller Blink, recommends <sup>109</sup> M. R. Banaji, M. Bazerman, and D. Chugh, "How (Un)Ethical Are You?" 81 (DECEMBER 2003) HARV. ARD-BUS. INESS-REVIEW, 56-64 (Dec. 2003).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Small caps

periodically calling to mind positive representatives of groups that are routinely stigmatized by negative cultural stereotypes.

“Get into the community more often with diverse groups.”

“Educate myself about other cultural norms. Take time to talk to interpreters, even if the litigant does not appear, about the culture and language nuances as they relate to the issues we handle.”

I. Maintain Constant Vigilance

What the Harvard Business Review says of managers holds true for judges: “Managers who aspire to be ethical must challenge the assumption that they’re always unbiased and acknowledge that vigilance, even more than good intention, is a defining characteristic of an ethical manager.”<sup>110</sup>

“Keep reminders (nonobvious) notes on the bench not to buy into patterns.”

I know that I’m not going to understand all of the cultures in the world, but I do try to learn about the cultures of people in my community. I go to community events, read books about their cultures and affirmatively work to find out more about their lives. One of my favorite books is The Spirit Catches You and You Fall Down, which Ann Fadiman wrote about the Hmong culture in the Central Valley.”

—Family law judge

Conclusion

---

<sup>110</sup>Ibid., p. 64.

The roots and dynamics of unintended bias run deep throughout all of life, and the judging enterprise is no exception. A commitment to understanding and eradicating these dynamics can go far in building access to truly neutral justice for all.

Chapter 11: Addressing litigant mental health issues in the courtroom

Introduction	11-13
I. Current Scientific Perspective on Mental Health Problems	131-1
A. The Roots of Mental Illness	11-1
B. The Burdens of Mental Illness	11-2
C. Common Responses to Mentally Ill Litigants	11-2
II. Strategies for Responding to These Challenges	11-63
A. The Importance of Case Specificity	11-6
B. Responding to Seriously Impaired Litigants	11-6
C. Dealing With the Chronically Mentally Ill	11-7
D. Excessively Frightened or Paranoid Litigants	11-9
E. Argumentative or “Unhappy” Litigants	11-9
F. The Importance of Disengagement and of Saying “No” Calmly	11-11
III. Community Resources	11-123
IV. Strategies for Coping With Difficult Cases	11-133
A. Keeping Perspective	11-13

B. Avoiding Isolation

11-13

| Conclusion

11-143

11

Addressing Litigant Mental Health Issues in the Courtroom

Introduction

For many judges and court staff, the problems of dealing with self-represented litigants are exacerbated by the fact that some of them may be suffering from forms of mental illness, recognized or unrecognized. This is particularly apparent in criminal cases where litigants generally have the right to counsel and are choosing to represent themselves.

Judges and court staff are often deeply uncertain about how to deal with these litigants, fearful of a potential loss of control and sometimes even of actual physical risk. At a minimum, these litigants are seen as highly disruptive to court functioning.

This chapter discusses the dynamics of mental illness in the self-represented litigant context and suggests approaches to assist in addressing litigants' needs and to minimize disruption of court processes.

I. Current Scientific Perspective on Mental Health Problems

A. The Roots of Mental Illness

Historically, mental health problems were thought to be behavioral in origin and nature. Modern medical research has taught us that mental health problems are the result of biological brain disorders that are diagnosable and treatable. Effective treatment, however, is often difficult for many to access. Generally, the behaviors exhibited by those with mental problems are symptomatic of their brain dysfunction.

B. The Burdens of Mental Illness

Litigants with mental health problems can be expected to carry significant psychological burdens as well. Some examples of such burdens are the following:

1. Adjusting to the Disease. Living with the disease is frightening. Mentally ill individuals are frequently misunderstood and isolated. They often feel like a disappointment or a burden to loved ones, and can also worry about harming them.
2. Social Stigma. Mental illness carries a social stigma that depletes a person's sense of self-worth. Mentally ill individuals often have been subjected to shaming, blaming, and guilt-inflicting behavior by others.
3. Fear. Litigants with mental health problems can be expected to be significantly fearful in the courtroom. How they exhibit this stress will vary from individual to individual.

C. Common Responses to Mentally Ill Litigants

Judges working with mentally ill litigants are often highly motivated to be helpful to them. Cognitive neuroscience has found that the desire to help people in trouble is strong.<sup>111</sup> This normal interpersonal response mechanism for human beings, as well as other highly social mammals, accounts for such things as our drive to hold our families together, to empathize with others whether or not we have consciously chosen to do so, or to commit acts of heroism entailing enormous self-sacrifice without much prior conscious analysis.

It also helps account for the varying levels of pain and discomfort, sometimes referred to as "survivor guilt," that we feel when exposed to those less fortunate than ourselves. Examples vary all the way from

---

<sup>111</sup> E. Kohler, C. Keysers, M. A. Umiltà, L. Fogassi, V. Gallese, and G. Rizzolatti, "Hearing Sounds, Understanding Actions: Action Representation in Mirror Neurons" (2002) 297(5582) SCIENCE 846-848 (2002); L. E. O'Connor, "Pathogenic Beliefs and Guilt in Human Evolution: Implications for Psychotherapy." In GENES ON THE COUCH: EXPLORATIONS IN EVOLUTIONARY PSYCHOLOGY 276-303 (P. Gilbert and K. Bailey, eds., London: Brunner-Routledge, 2001), 276-303.

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

the horror of witnessing an injury accident, to listening to the testimony of a person who has been brutalized, to avoiding a homeless person trying to sell papers on the street, to how we feel generally around sick people or while visiting in hospitals.<sup>112</sup>

Judges must be able to recognize feelings of discomfort they may have in dealing with a litigant's mental health issues. Many people feel uncomfortable working with such individuals. (This can be just as true for mental health professionals as for lawyers and judges.) The "survivor guilt" response can account for much of this discomfort.

This feeling can arise fairly easily—prompted by the litigants' appearance, speech, or demeanor, or some bizarre act on their part. A judge may be only vaguely sensitive to the feeling, particularly while working on a busy calendar, and will simply feel more pressured or will experience impatience or some other uncomfortable state. Unfortunately, the emotional defenses against these uncomfortable feelings are such things as anger, frustration, or blaming the litigant. These undesirable responses are particularly likely to appear when a judge is unaware of, or does not understand the reason for, his or her own discomfort and acts out on those feelings perhaps because of being distracted by a busy docket.

Judges are required to work with litigants with mental health problems in situations that can cause significant frustration. It is important that such feelings not get in the way of decision making.

Unfortunately, it is not always possible for the court to intervene in some way that will be helpful to a litigant. Litigants with mental health issues are more likely than most to ask the court for relief that is simply not available.

---

<sup>112</sup> L. E. O'Connor, J. W. Berry, and J. Weiss, "Interpersonal Guilt, Shame and Psychological Problems," (1999) 18 JOURNAL OF SOCIAL AND CLINICAL PSYCHOLOGY 181-203 (1999).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

I was handling a case with a really resistant defendant who just wasn't complying with any of my orders. During hearings he would often fail to pay attention when I spoke to him, would not respond directly to questions, and seemed unwilling to cooperate with reasonable requests. I tried sanctioning him, but that didn't seem to make a difference.

In reviewing his file, I saw that his mother had only been 20 years old when he was born and had been repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses. It occurred to me that he might be suffering from fetal alcohol syndrome and that maybe his failure to comply with orders was as a result of an inability to do so.

I changed my approach from treating him as willfully noncompliant to someone who was going to need coaching to make it through the legal requirements. I had him come to court more often and started praising him for anything positive that I could find that he had done. Lo and behold, he actually started following my orders. I'm not a doctor and don't know if that's really what his situation was, but realizing that there might be a physical cause for some of his actions helped me not take what he was doing so personally and helped me be more creative in how I responded to it.

-- Judge

Being unable to help a litigant, or even to help him or her understand why the proceedings are going the way they are, is highly unpleasant for almost any judge. If this occurs frequently, judges can become vulnerable to withdrawing empathy from the litigant(s) altogether in an attempt to avoid the emotional stress of the situation.

Even when a judge is able to be helpful, litigants are not always able to acknowledge the help they are receiving. They behave in an argumentative or otherwise difficult manner toward the judge, which may add to the judge's frustration and ultimately create resentment.

There are numerous reasons why individuals with mental illness may not seek or accept treatment that has been offered to them. When litigants appear as if they do not want help, it will stem from one or both of two sources: either a negative prior experience with mental health treatment or their own symptomology.

Although improvements have been made, many antipsychotic medications have serious and permanent negative side effects. Many persons with serious chronic mental illness are simply not capable of keeping up a medication regimen and routinely making appointments on time, and so reasonable outpatient treatment is not feasible. Furthermore, they cannot cope with the social interactions necessary to manage handling a serious chronic illness on their own and often simply give up on the mental health system.

Some individuals with mental health issues, and often those addicted to drugs and alcohol, will not seek treatment because they have lost all hope of being able to recover. Often this is expressed as denial of the problem. This denial disappears quickly as the possibility of recovery becomes more of a reality.

The overlap with the lack of medical detoxification facilities is clear. When medical detoxification is available, the resistance to treatment declines considerably.

If a judge can communicate to litigants his or her genuine belief that recovery is possible, the effect can be dramatic in breaking through addict hopelessness and denial. Drug treatment courts have found coercive treatment to be effective for many addicts, particularly when conducted in treatment courts presided over by genuinely supportive judges who can communicate their confidence in the individual's ability to get and stay clean and sober.

Not as personally related to the litigants is the fact that the legal system has become a frontline of mental health treatment. People who are in trouble, who need help far beyond what the court has traditionally provided, are now appearing as self-represented litigants. Court staff, self-help centers, prisons, and county and state jails are charged with taking care of the chronically mentally ill, the suicidal and high-acuity mental crises, the drug addicted, and those without resources. There are simply not enough places to refer people for the help they need.

Unless they are abusing alcohol and other drugs, most people with mental illness are no more violent than people without mental illness.

Nevertheless, if feelings of discomfort rise to the level of fear, it is imperative to pay attention to that feeling. Judges must put their own safety, and that of their staff, above other considerations. A litigant with mental health issues may act in a threatening manner simply to see how a judge will respond, hoping that the judge will remain calm and in control. Or the litigant may be threatening as a warning that they are about to actually go out of control. There is no way to know for sure. Security must be the priority.

II. Strategies for Responding to These Challenges

A. The Importance of Case Specificity

The following suggestions are generalizations and are given in hopes of being helpful; however, judges should understand that there are no formulas for dealing with litigants' mental health problems. What works well with one litigant may be completely ineffective or even harmful to another with the same disorder. While medical professionals have clustered mental health symptoms into patterns of diagnoses, there is no patient profile that predicts anyone's interpersonal reactions in any particular situation. The most important thing is to pay careful attention to each individual. Each case is different and requires the judge's specific attention and assessment.

B. Responding to Seriously Impaired Litigants

Judges may be called on to make certain kinds of mental health judgments from the bench, even when not in civil commitment or other mental health court assignments. Progress of a case may have to be deferred until the mental health issue has been addressed.

1. Hospitalization. Most jurisdictions have similar criteria for determining whether a person should be taken involuntarily to an emergency inpatient facility.
  - a. Is the person a danger to himself or herself?
  - b. Is the person a danger to others?
  - c. Is the person so impaired as to not be able to tend to the basic necessities of life?
2. Law Enforcement. If a judge perceives that any of these factors is applicable to litigants in the courtroom, he or she may want to request the immediate assistance of local law enforcement. In most states, law enforcement officers are trained in the assessment required for admission to an emergency psychiatric facility, or they know where to promptly obtain such an assessment.

3. Adult Protective Services. If the litigant is not going to fit the hospitalization criteria, but is still so seriously impaired as to prevent meaningful participation in the case, a call to the local Adult Protective Services might be helpful in getting services for the litigant—including legal services.
4. Guardian Ad Litem. A seriously disordered litigant may have a friend or family member who would be willing to serve as a GAL. The court should consult with local legal services programs, public defender offices, and local bar association pro bono programs to determine how to get qualified legal representation for guardians ad litem and to have review of the appropriateness of the proposed guardian. The court should not proceed with a guardian ad litem unless it is clear that the nature of the disorder prevents the litigant from proceeding on his or her own.
5. Public Guardian. A call to the public guardian might also result in assistance for the person, possibly through the provision of a GAL or a conservatorship proceeding.

C. Dealing With the Chronically Mentally Ill

Often, persons suffering from chronic mental illnesses bring matters to the court. They are either asking for help from the court or are the subject of an action for relief by some other person. The following approaches may be helpful.

1. Relieving the Litigant's Anxiety. Judges might think of themselves as anxiety relievers for a chronically mentally ill person. A litigant may be suffering from a delusion or hearing voices, or may be in some other equally frightened state of mind.
2. Seeking Help for Delusions. Mentally ill litigants might ask the court to help them with their delusions. For example, they might ask the court to stop the government from implanting a microchip in their tooth; to restrain their neighbor from coming through the wall at night while they sleep; or to offer relief from the poison the phone company has put into their air vents.

3. Paying Respectful Attention to the Litigant. The litigants will be paying close attention to whether the judge is trying to simply “get rid” of them. They have most likely had many experiences with people being frightened by them and trying to dismiss them as quickly as possible, and so are highly sensitive to this sort of treatment.
4. Using Staff to Talk to Litigants. If there are self-help support people available, they may be able to spend some time with the litigants, work with them, and help find useful resources for them.
5. Sticking Strictly to Facts—and Being Honest. The judge can say that the litigant’s story sounds unusual; that he or she has never heard of the government implanting chips before, and so forth. This can be done without directly dismissing the person’s own sense of reality. There is no need to verbally label the person as crazy or directly point out his or her mental illness. Point out what evidence would be needed to get the relief requested—is it possible to get an x-ray from a dentist showing the chip in the tooth? a photograph of the neighbor coming through the wall? or an analysis of the poison air from the vent? In asking for this proof, the judge is merely asking what he or she would ask of anyone. Once this is explained to litigants with mental illness, they generally accept this information as an indication that they are not being singled out.
6. Making a Legal Service Referral. If the litigant is making a request for relief from the court, a referral to a community legal services resource or the local pro bono program would be enormously beneficial. If the litigant is the subject of a request for relief by another, this referral becomes even more critical.
7. Making a Social Service Referral. If the person seems open to suggestion, it may be possible to make a referral to some local mental health resource. In making such a referral, the judge should make it clear that he or she wants to be helpful and is not being disapproving or punitive. For example, the judge might say, “I think you might be able to get assistance at County Behavioral Health” rather than “I think you should go to . . . ,” as if the judge had diagnosed the litigant. The individual, however, may simply be too fearful to be open to such a suggestion.

D. Excessively Frightened or Paranoid Litigants

Most litigants are anxious about being in a courtroom. Self-represented litigants who are excessively frightened or even paranoid can be particularly challenging for judges because it can often be difficult to question them. A litigant may resist answering the questions the judge asks.

1. Not Pushing. Pushing for answers by the judge may make the problem worse.
2. Stepping Back. In stepping back rather than increasing pressure on the litigant, the judge can redirect the conversation or take a brief break and try again. Aggressive questioning is likely to fail and can lead to an increasing sense of struggle between the judge and the litigant. This type of courtroom tension is counterproductive for everyone.
3. Using Staff. If there are self-help support staff available, perhaps they can take time to work with the litigant while the judge proceeds with other matters.
4. Being Realistic. Judges should be prepared for the fact that they may not get the information they need from the litigant. The litigant simply may not be able to comply. Accepting and acknowledging this reality will contribute far more to courtroom control than protracted arguing.

E. Argumentative or “Unhappy” Litigants

Some litigants demonstrate their illness to the court by being completely incapable of acknowledging help. No matter what the judge does, it will be wrong. Regardless of the amount of help offered, such litigants may insist that they have not been helped at all. They may say things like the following:

1. "You aren't really helping me";
2. "You don't care at all, I'm just a number";
3. "If I don't get help soon . . .";
4. "So you are saying they can do anything they want . . .";
and
5. "So you don't care if my children are safe."

Appropriate and helpful responses include the following:

1. Not Taking It Personally. Judges should not take comments such as these personally. Litigants tend to test judges the same way they test doctors, therapists, and other authorities to see how the authority will respond. These sorts of comments from litigants tend to make the recipient feel bad, like a failure, disrespected, defensive, or some other negative thing that the litigant himself or herself has repeatedly felt. It usually mirrors some experience that they have had in their lives that is beyond the inquiry of the court. The behavior is symptomatic of the illness and not a sign of personal disrespect.
2. Relaxing. When a judge can be aware of this dynamic, it makes a productive response far easier. A relaxed, calm, firm, and nonreactive or nondefensive response from a judge is the best reaction available.
3. Engaging and Listening. The litigant needs to know that the judge is listening and paying attention.
4. Expressing the Desire to Help. Litigants place a great deal of weight on their perceptions about a judge's motives toward them.<sup>113</sup> Judges should expressly show that it is the court's intention to help them and to be of value to them. A judge might say:
  - a. "How can I help you today?"
  - b. "I want to be helpful to you."
  - c. "I'm sorry—I just can't think of anything else to help you."

---

<sup>113</sup> Tyler, What Is Procedural Justice? p-at 103.

5. Being Firm. Litigants should not be allowed to escalate into angry or genuinely disrespectful behavior toward the judge or other courtroom staff.
6. Disengaging When Necessary. Do not hesitate to take a recess to stop or redirect unacceptable behavior. Sometimes a brief break is all it takes.

F. The Importance of Disengagement and of Saying “No” Calmly

The ability of a judge to disengage from dysfunctional interactions with litigants cannot be overemphasized.

1. Trusting Oneself. Judges can rely on their own feelings and perceptions to tell them what is happening. If judges find themselves feeling uncomfortable during an exchange with a litigant, it is almost certain that the litigant is also uncomfortable. Something needs to be changed. Judges should make themselves feel as relaxed and comfortable in the courtroom as possible. When the judge feels genuinely comfortable, the chances are better that the litigants will, too.
2. Setting Limits Calmly and Firmly. Litigants do not really benefit from being allowed to go on endlessly, arguing with a judge. Certainly, giving litigants their “voice” in a hearing is central to any justice proceeding. However, when a litigant cannot refrain from repeating him or herself, arguing with or even verbally abusing the judge or opposing party, the judge must put a stop to it. In many cases, the longer that litigants are allowed to continue with this behavior, the more anxious and upset they get.

Judges actually help litigants by setting limits on unacceptable behavior. By keeping such behavior to a minimum, judges are reducing the chances that it might affect their decision-making process.

Judges are responsible for maintaining a calm and comfortable process for everyone else in the courtroom. Being able to relax and say “no” to an unhappy or angry litigant without becoming defensive or unkind demonstrates to the rest of the courtroom that the judge is clearly in control of himself or herself, and of the situation.

Disengagement can be made in various ways, for example:

- a. "I'm sorry, but we are simply out of time."
- b. "I have to leave enough time for the other people here in the courtroom."
- c. "I would like you to talk with the (court staff) person while I move on to the next case."
- d. "I am going to take a short recess."

III. Community Resources

Knowledge of available resources in the community and of those working with litigants' mental health issues helps the judge and the court as a whole manage these issues.

1. Resource Guides. Each court should have a guide for judges on what culturally competent and multilingual resources are available in the community to assist litigants with mental health and related issues.
2. Collaborative Courts. In some cases, it may be possible to establish specialized calendars, such as drug treatment court, mental health court, or domestic violence court, during which particular social service providers can be present to assist litigants in the courtroom.
3. Lack of Community Resources. If courts are located in communities without many legal service or social service resources, it is a good idea to locate the nearest place where services are available. Partnerships, supported by computer, telephone, and video-conference technology, may be able to help.

IV. Strategies for Coping With Difficult Cases

A. Keeping Perspective

One way that judges can become vulnerable to added stress is by losing perspective on the degree of power they actually have to help a litigant with mental health issues. If judges expect too much from themselves or from their roles as judges, or if they accept unrealistic expectations placed on them by the litigants, the result is increased stress and lower job satisfaction. While it is understandable that one would feel unhappy about matters such as those listed below, judges should not hold themselves responsible for fixing them. Feelings of guilt and frustration at not being able to change things over which they have no control can become a problem for judges if not recognized. It is useful to remember the following:

1. Judges will not always be able to be helpful to litigants.
2. Judges will not always be able to make litigants believe that the court cares about them, even when it does.
3. Judges cannot make up for the lack of mental health treatment services available in the community, but may provide impetus to further address the need. Seek help from the Judges' Leadership Initiative, a group of judges interested in mental health issues (<http://consensusproject.org/JLI/>).
4. Judges cannot make up for the lack of legal assistance services available in the community.
5. Often there may simply not be a good solution available to a judge.

B. Avoiding Isolation

Isolation is a commonly cited factor in research on judicial stress.<sup>114</sup> Working with others in the courtroom is helpful in relieving courtroom isolation. Naturally, rigorous care must be paid to the constitutional safeguards for the litigants and protocols developed so as to avoid such things as ex parte communications. Self-help programs can place attorneys and other legal assistance staff in courtrooms to assist with <sup>114</sup> T. Ellis and R. Showalter, "Work Related Stress in American Judges," (1994) 22(1) BULL. ETIN OF AMERICAN AM. ACAD. EMY OF PSYCH. IATRY AND THE& LAW 71-83 (1994).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

procedural information, help parties reach settlements, and write up the court's orders. Having self-help staff in the courtroom to whom litigants can be referred works to relieve some of the isolation of judging. In the collaborative court models, often there are social service providers in the courtroom to whom litigants can be referred. This also helps relieve isolation. Studies have found that judges who are involved in community work outside the court report higher levels of job satisfaction.<sup>115</sup> Judges should try to participate in community activities, join professional work groups and committees, and communicate with family and friends.

Conclusion

While mental health issues do indeed increase the challenge of serving the self-represented, both judges and court staff, when properly prepared and supported, can move toward resolving any legal issues and assisting in getting such litigants the help they need.

---

<sup>115</sup> P. Fulton Hora and D. J. Chase, Judicial Satisfaction When Judging in a Therapeutic Key, (2003-2004) 7(1) CONTEMP. ORARY ISSUES IN LAW, 8, p. 19 (2003-04); J. P. Ryan, A. Ashman, B. Sales, and S. Shane-DuBow, AMERICAN TRIAL JUDGES (New York: Free Press, 1980).

Formatted: Font: Italic

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

Formatted: Font: Not Italic, Small caps

Chapter 12: Judicial Leadership in Access to Justice

Introduction 12-13

I. Judicial Leadership and the Judicial Role 12-13

II. Sensitivity to the Value and Potential of the Roles of Others 12-23

- A. Building a Consensus Within a Court for Access Innovations 12-2
- B. Building and Reinforcing Staff Support for Such Innovations 12-2
- C. Working With the Bar to Build Joint-Access Innovations 12-3
- D. Developing Programs That Engage Judges in Access Innovations 12-3
- E. Encouraging and Supporting Community Initiatives That Facilitate Access 12-3
- F. Envisioning the Potential of Access to Justice for All 12-5

IV. Supporting Many Kinds of Innovation 12-43

- A. Self-Help Services 12-4
- B. Simpler Procedures 12-4
- C. Pro Bono and Limited Scope Representation Programs 12-5
- D. Community-Focused Court Planning 12-5

E.	Meetings on Self-Represented Litigants	12-5
F.	Speeches to Community Groups	12-6
G.	Reforms of Internal Courtroom Procedures	12-6
H.	Community Resources for Litigants	12-6

V. Access for the Self-Represented as Part of an Overall Access Strategy 12-73

Conclusion 12-73

12

Judicial Leadership in Access to Justice

Introduction

In the end, it is simple: judicial leadership is indispensable.

Court systems are highly complicated organizations, perhaps appropriately not conducive to rapid transformative change. Judges are often the only players with the credibility, reputation, and leverage to build the momentum needed to increase access for the self-represented—and indeed for all people.

This chapter explains that it is appropriate for judges to play this role, both within the court and in the community beyond, explores some of the ways that judges have exercised this leadership, and emphasizes the importance of making sure that such leadership is part of a comprehensive strategy for access to justice, not just for the self-represented but for all.

I. Judicial Leadership and the Judicial Role

Some judges fear that engagement in the overall functioning of the justice system—particularly when it involves leadership in building and inspiring partnerships with the bar, legal aid, and community organizations—is inconsistent with judicial neutrality and therefore with their role.

However, this role is critical to expand services and resources that will allow the system to work effectively and to build resources so that cases involving self-represented litigants can truly be decided on the law and facts of the case.

When the judge explains his or her role in any community or court leadership activity, it reinforces the public's understanding both of the court's commitment to access and neutrality and of the importance of that commitment.

II. Sensitivity to the Value and Potential of the Roles of Others

Whenever judges walk into the room, they bring an inherent credibility possessed by almost no other professional. That credibility comes in part from a presumed intellectual and moral capacity validated by their appointment or election, and in part from an awareness of their broad experience in making decisions in complex and important matters. But it may come more than anything from the understanding of the judge's role as neutral—the belief that what the judge is saying and doing is not driven by any self-interest or bias but by a considered understanding of what the public interest requires.

Therefore those judicial leadership activities that make use of this unique credibility are both most likely to be successful and most valuable, in that through such activities judges can achieve changes that no one else may be able to bring about.

Such activities are likely to include the following roles.

A. Building a Consensus Within a Court for Access Innovations

The unique credibility of a judge can help the staff and the court's leadership focus on the ultimate purpose of the court as an institution, as well as encouraging flexibility and creativity in support of those innovations that will better serve that ultimate access purpose.

Matters such as budget, job descriptions, departmental responsibilities, and inertia are less likely to provide insurmountable barriers to change when judges promote the need for change or a particular innovation.

B. Building and Reinforcing Staff Support for Such Innovations

Innovations that increase access to justice frequently have the effect of asking court staff and community service providers to do more than is typically in their job description. While such staff receive gratification from helping people, and from the positive response that most litigants show to those who are genuinely trying to help, recognition by the judge for their efforts is also tremendously helpful. Some judges consider giving awards, holding a reception, or just saying thanks.

C. Working With the Bar to Build Joint-Access Innovations

Occasional rhetoric notwithstanding, lawyers deeply respect judges and generally do look to judges for guidance on the direction of the legal system. Judges are therefore ideally positioned to help both bar organizations and individual lawyers expand their views concerning the need for all persons to be able to access the justice system, to think more broadly about their obligations as part of a profession committed to the public interest, and to assess whether the bar might benefit from new forms of attorney-client relationships such as limited scope representation.

D. Developing Programs That Engage Judges in Access Innovations

It is a truism: judges listen to judges.

Judges are therefore indispensable in creating, marketing, and shaping any programs that seek to assist judges in ensuring effective access to the courts for self-represented litigants.

A wide variety of educational programs, seminars, writing, and discussion about issues regarding self-represented litigants is necessary to deepen the judiciary's collective understanding of courtroom dynamics before the system is truly as effective as it can be. Judges must lead these activities.

Moreover, the promotion of the judicial role in the kinds of leadership activities described in this chapter is primarily a role for judges.

E. Encouraging and Supporting Community Initiatives That Facilitate Access

In the community, the judge brings a similar unique credibility and can help convince community leadership of the court's integrity and its interest in access.

F. Envisioning the Potential of Access to Justice for All

More broadly, when judges speak about the importance of access to justice, their perspective can resonate with a wide variety of stakeholders.

IV. Supporting Many Kinds of Innovation

It is not surprising; therefore, that many judges find it rewarding and effective to deploy their skills and credibility in support of the following solutions.

A. Self-Help Services

Self-help services remain the gateway to the courts and a major guarantor of the smoothness of the court's entire operations.

Judicial credibility plays a major role in making sure that self-help services are available throughout the court process and are properly staffed and supervised by qualified attorneys. Judges can ensure that self-help services are seen as part of the court's core infrastructure, are integrated into the court's senior management structure, and that the court's systems of evaluation and self-assessment include services for the self-represented.

B. Simpler Procedures

System simplification is a major challenge. Over the years processes have acquired their own logic, their own constituencies, and their own rationalizations. Often they are widely believed to be mandated by external forces such as the legislature or the constitution, and thus not subject to any reassessment. The result is often that processes that are highly complicated and wasteful, and that result in sometimes insurmountable barriers to access for the self-represented, are considered "off the table" for discussion and revision.

Because judges are the experts on the primary sources of perceived external mandate, and because they are the most respected sources of authority in the court system, they are the logical ones to launch the review and reform of these processes.

Such processes include paper flow, clerk and case management processes, calendaring, and forms (to the extent that they are developed locally).

C. Pro Bono and Limited Scope Representation Programs

Clearly, not all litigants are able to represent themselves, and pro bono and limited scope or unbundling programs are crucial to meet the needs of persons requiring more than self-help assistance. These programs depend on bar participation, and both the extent and style of participation are very much a matter of local culture.

Judges are the effective heads of local legal culture and should seek ways to send signals that help transform that culture. They can, for example, make sure that the calendar does not needlessly burden pro bono attorneys or attorneys that provide limited scope services; they can make sure that limited scope attorneys are eligible for fee-shifting payments; they can respect the limits of limited scope representation agreements; they can add a personal note of thanks to a pro bono attorney and encourage public recognition.

D. Community-Focused Court Planning

The judge's participation in community-based court planning sends the strongest possible signal of the court's sincerity in its desire to listen to the community's agenda. Hearing from the community provides critical information to the court as it seeks to appropriately serve all members of the community—including self-represented litigants.

Such participation can also be educational for the community. The judge's clear voice in explaining the court's philosophy can do much to legitimate the court's overall approach and insulate it against the short-term attacks that unpopular rulings can trigger.

E. Meetings on Self-Represented Litigants

As courts focus on self-represented litigant issues, and as they seek to understand better what goes wrong for such litigants and how it might be fixed, the judge's participation brings a critical perspective lacking in other court participants. The perspective of the problems the judge may experience are needed to craft overall changes, and the judge's presence signals the importance of the issue and the priority that should be placed on it.

F. Speeches to Community Groups

General educational programs, while not necessarily leading to specific innovations, convey a clear message to the community about how the court works and about general legal issues while exposing the judge to community dynamics and perspectives. Business leaders will want to know about small claims and other consumer matters as well as services to which they can refer employees with legal concerns. Law enforcement officers will appreciate the court understanding challenges they face routinely as well as efforts to write orders that are easier to enforce.

G. Reforms of Internal Courtroom Procedures

In the courtroom the judge is supreme. Courtroom innovations, whether in the way judges themselves manage hearings and the receipt of evidence, or through new courtroom services for litigants such as those that help prepare written orders or provide day-of-hearing unbundled assistance, depend on judicial support and energy. They often have the added advantage of making the judge's job easier.

H. Community Resources for Litigants

Judges also report that they have been able to expand resources available to the litigants in front of them by:

1. Convening meetings with social services providers (preferably with food). People come when the judge calls the meeting.
2. Talking about the problems that the litigants face and why it would be helpful to have social services programs in the courtroom or to have easy referrals to services.
3. Asking the social services agencies what their needs are and how the court can help them to provide services.

4. Thanking them for their efforts.

V. Access for the Self-Represented as Part of an Overall Access Strategy

Each step that a judge takes in support of access for the self-represented becomes part of the long-term collective agenda of the court system as a whole.

In the long term, judges are generally most effective when they see these steps as part of an overall strategy, not just for the self-represented, but for all those in need of access to justice.

Again and again, an innovation targeted initially at the self-represented, whether standardizing forms and processes, creating additional courthouse assistance resources, redesigning caseload management, or changing the way the judge conducts hearings, comes to be seen as assisting all.

The forms reduce costs by speeding legal work and facilitating unbundling; the courthouse assistance programs serve lawyers, too, as well as speeding courtroom procedures and reducing delay and adjournments; changes in the conduct of hearings reduce frustration and increase trust and confidence.

Thus a strategic view that always looks at the system as a whole provides the best chance for change, the greatest chance for the most effective change, and the greatest hope for broad stakeholder participation.

Conclusion

The role of the judge is crucial.

An inspired, inspiring, and engaged judge can help lead changes in our system that will improve the access to justice, and thus the lives and the belief in our democratic institutions, of millions.

Appendix One

REACHING OUT OR OVERREACHING Judicial Ethics and Self-Represented Litigants

Cynthia Gray, American Judicature Society (2005)
(Reprinted with Permission)

Proposed Best Practices for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants

These practices are helpful, and many are required, in all cases, not just those involving self-represented litigants.

GENERAL

1. When a litigant appears without an attorney, verify that the litigant understands that he or she is entitled to be represented by an attorney; give information on pro bono or lawyer referral resources. Explain that self representation is difficult, you as judge cannot act as an advocate for either side, and the other party's attorney will not provide assistance or advice.
  - If an unrepresented litigant appears to be mentally disabled, take additional steps to involve counsel and other support services.
  - The difficulty of self-representation should be emphasized in cases that are particularly complex, cases where the stakes are very high, and jury cases.
  - Once it is clear a litigant does not intend to get an attorney, do not harp on pro se status or make negative comments that suggest prejudgment or disapproval.
2. Direct the litigant to the resources available for self-represented litigants.
  - Inform a self-represented litigant that he or she has the responsibility to become familiar with and attempt to comply with the rules of procedure.
  - Repeat information regarding resources at every stage in the process.
3. Be generous in granting extensions of time to self-represented litigants (and others) to prepare for a hearing, obtain counsel, or comply with other requirements as long as the litigant appears to be acting in good faith, making an effort, and giving notice to the other side.

4. Ensure that court interpreters are available for all court proceedings (including settlement discussions) involving self-represented litigants (and others) who have language barriers.
5. Give a basic introduction to courtroom protocol, for example, the importance of timeliness, checking in with the clerk (if that is necessary), who sits where, directing arguments to you, not other parties or attorneys, rising when you enter, and other matters you consider important (attire, gum chewing, reading while court is in session, etc.).
6. Explain the prohibition on ex parte communications (you cannot talk to one side without the other side being present and litigants cannot file any papers with the court that are not served on the other side).
7. Actively manage and schedule cases involving self-represented litigants.
8. Insofar as possible, monitor counsel to ensure that a self-represented litigant is not being misled.

A COURTEOUS COURTROOM

9. Start court on time (required in all cases); if delay is unavoidable, apologize and offer a brief explanation.
10. Explain to self-represented litigants that the rude conduct displayed on television shows like Judge Judy is not acceptable in a real courtroom, either from them or directed to them.
11. Treat self-represented litigants with patience, dignity, and courtesy (required toward all participants in all court proceedings).
  - Do not make comments or use a tone and manner that are rude, intimidating, harsh, threatening, angry, sarcastic, discouraging, belittling, humiliating, or disdainful.
  - Do not interrupt self-represented litigants unless necessary to control proceedings or prevent discourtesy.
  - Do not engage in protracted dialogues or make off-hand, negative comments regarding their pro se status.
  - Address self-represented litigants with titles comparable to those used for counsel.
  - Avoid over-familiar conduct toward attorneys (for example, using first names, sharing in-jokes, referring to other proceedings or bar events, inviting attorneys into chambers, chatting casually before or after court proceedings).

12. Require court staff and attorneys to treat self-represented litigants (and everyone else) with patience, dignity, and courtesy.
13. Pay attention and act like you are paying attention.
  - If you take notes or refer to books or information on a computer screen during a proceeding, explain what you are doing so the litigants understand that they have your attention.

PLEADINGS

14. Construe pleadings liberally.
  - Look behind the label of a document filed by a self-represented litigant and give effect to the substance, rather than the form or terminology.
  - Do not ignore an obvious possible cause of action or defense suggested by the facts alleged in the pleadings even if the litigant does not expressly refer to that theory.
  - Consider information in other documents filed by a self-represented litigant.
  - Allow amendment freely.
15. Give a self-represented litigant notice of any substantive defect in a pleading and an opportunity to remedy the defect unless it is absolutely clear that no adequate amendment is possible.
16. Read all relevant materials and announce that you have done so before making a ruling.
17. Give the rationale for a decision either in writing or orally on the record.
18. When announcing a decision or entering an order, do not use legal jargon, abbreviations, acronyms, shorthand, or slang.
19. If possible, after each court appearance, provide all litigants with clear written notice of further hearings, referrals, or other obligations.
20. Ensure that all orders (for example, regarding discovery) clearly explain the possible consequences of failure to comply.
21. Follow the principle that cases should be disposed of on the merits, rather than with strict regard to technical rules of procedure.
22. Instruct a self-represented litigant how to accomplish a procedural action he or she is obviously attempting or direct them to resources that will provide such instructions.
  - Do not tell a self-represented litigant what tactic to use, but explain how to accomplish the procedure he or she has chosen.

23. If a motion for summary judgment is filed, advise a self-represented litigant that he or she has the right to file counter-affidavits or other responsive material and that failure to respond might result in the entry of judgment against the litigant.
24. Decide all motions filed by a self-represented litigant without undue delay.

SETTLEMENT

25. At a pre-trial or status conference, bring up the possibility of settling the matter or referring it to mediation.
  - Encourage, but do not try to coerce, settlement or mediation.
26. If the parties present you with an agreed order settling a case, engage in allocution to determine whether the self-represented litigant understands the agreement and entered into it voluntarily.
  - Explain that if an agreement is approved, it becomes an order of the court with which both parties will be required to comply.
  - Determine that any waiver of substantive rights is knowing and voluntary.

PRE-HEARING

27. Explain the process and ground rules (e.g., that you will hear from both sides, who goes first, everything said will be recorded, witnesses will be sworn in, witnesses may be cross examined, how to make an objection).
28. Explain the elements and the burden of proof.
29. Explain the kinds of evidence that can be presented and the kinds of evidence that cannot be considered.
  - Explain that you will make your decision based only on the evidence presented.
  - Encourage the parties to stipulate to uncontested facts and the admission of as much of the documentary evidence as possible.
30. Try to get all parties and counsel to agree to relax technical rules of procedure and evidence so that the hearing can proceed informally with an emphasis on both sides getting a chance to tell their story.

HEARING

31. Ensure that the notice of hearing unambiguously describes in a way a self-represented litigant can understand that a hearing on the merits is being scheduled and the litigant should be prepared with evidence and witnesses to present the case or defense.

32. Allow non-attorneys to sit at counsel table with either party to provide support but do not permit them to argue on behalf of a party or to question witnesses.
33. Before starting, ask both parties whether they understand the process and the procedures.
34. Call breaks where necessary if a litigant is becoming confused or tempers on either side are becoming frayed (or your patience is running low).
35. Question any witness for clarification when the facts are confused, undeveloped, or misleading.
  - Explain at the beginning of a hearing that you will ask questions if necessary to make sure you understand the testimony and have the information you need to make a decision.
  - Ask the same type of questions of witnesses called by a represented party if warranted.
  - Take care that your language and tone when asking questions does not indicate your attitude towards the merits or the credibility of the witness.
37. Follow the rules of evidence that go to reliability but use discretion and overrule objections on technical matters such as establishing a foundation for introducing documents and exhibits, qualifying an expert, and the form of questions or testimony.
  - If you relax a rule for a self-represented party, relax it for a represented party as well.
  - Require counsel to explain objections in detail.
  - If counsel objects, ask if he or she is arguing that the evidence is unreliable.
  - Explain rulings on evidence.
38. If necessary to prevent obvious injustice, allow a brief recess or adjourn for the day (or longer) to allow a self-represented litigant (or even a represented litigant) to obtain additional evidence or witnesses.
39. Do not allow counsel to bully or confuse self-represented litigants or their witnesses.

THE DECISION

40. Announce and explain your decision immediately from the bench with both parties present if possible unless the volatility of the proceedings suggests that a written decision would be preferable to prevent outbursts and attempts to re-argue the case.
41. If you decide to take a matter under advisement, inform the parties that you wish to consider their evidence and arguments and will issue a decision shortly.
If possible, announce a date by which a decision will be reached.
42. Reach a decision promptly (required in all cases).
43. Issue an order in plain English explaining the decision, addressing all material issues raised, resolving contested issues of fact, and announcing conclusions of law.
44. If asked about reconsideration or appeal, refer the litigant to resources for self-represented litigants on this topic.
45. If asked about enforcement of an order or collection of a judgment, refer the litigant to any resources for self-represented litigants on this topic.

The ideas in these best practices are based on the paper Reaching Out or Overreaching: Judicial Ethics and the Self-Represented Litigant; on the "Proposed Protocol to Be Used by Judges During Hearings Involving Pro Se Litigants" from the Pro Se Implementation Committee of the Minnesota Conference of Chief Judges; on the November 2004 draft of "Judicial Guidelines for Hearings Involving Self-Represented Litigants" proposed by the Subcommittee on Judicial Guidelines of the Massachusetts Supreme Court Steering Committee on Self-Represented Litigants;" on "Judicial Techniques for Cases Involving Self-Represented Litigants" by Rebecca Albrecht, John Greacen, Bonnie Hough, and Richard Zorza, published in the winter 2003 Judges' Journal; and on "Self-Represented Litigants: Learning from Ten Years of Experience in Family Courts" by John Greacen, published in the winter 2005 Judges' Journal.